The bane of both these schools is their excessive subjectivity, which renders them equally unscientific. Science deals with the objective and universal alone: and neither the principle of the association of ideas nor that of à priori intuition can attain it. The question recurs: what causes the "inseparable association" of certain ideas, and not of others—what accounts for the necessary character of any intuition whatever? The only possible answer is: the action of the environment, reflecting its necessary relations in human intelligence. Scientific Ethics abut on the necessity of things, whence result the necessities of thought,—conceding to the experiential school that all knowledge comes by experience, and to the intuitional school that moral intuition is a fact. But Scientific Ethics show on the one hand that experience covers all human contact with the objective, and therefore includes moral intuition as well as physical sensation; and show on the other hand that moral intuition is not an à priori principle, but an objective perception. Experientialism can render no reason why any one ought to aim at his own happiness, or the "greatest happiness of the greatest number;" intuitionalism can render no reason why a merely subjective principle should possess any objective or universal validity. At this decisive point Scientific Ethics step in to disclose the objective character of Moral Obligation as a part of the Nature of Things, and the immediate contact of the mind with Moral Relations by means of Moral Intuitions as a part of human experience. While both of the recognized schools rest moral obligation on a ruinous subjectivity, Scientific Ethics rest it on a real and absolute objectivity, and thus secures the universality without which science can find no foundation anywhere. In Scientific Ethics, therefore, uniting objective Moral Obligation with subjective Moral Intuition in the Moral History of Man, which it explains by the law of evolution through the constant action and reaction of the environment and the human mind, Morality for the first time takes its proper place among the natural sciences.

THE FUTURE OF SCIENTIFIC ETHICS.

Unheralded, unsuspected, this sublimest of all sciences has become the ideal foundation of a mighty nation. When the Declaration of Independence laid the corner-stone of this great republic in "certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," what was it but the dedication of a continent to the Primary Rights of Man, in all their objective reality and boundless universality? Yet that grand dedication involved the whole of Scientific Ethics. Here in this Western world a vast society has been erected on the basis of ideas deep as the foundations of the universe, secular and yet sacred, certain to become the indestructible groundwork of the dawning religion of the world. Imperfect as this society still is, it is destined to become the living illustration to all mankind that the hope of all hearts is no idle dream, but the beginning of a visible heaven; and that the magnificent SCIENCE OF ETHICS is yet to give birth to the still more magnificent ART by which the name Humanity shall be made the synonyme of Truth, Virtue, and Love.

THE DISCUSSION OF "DARWINISM" by the Philosophical Section of the Evangelical Alliance, if not brilliant, is in some respects satisfactory. It shows that the divines are beginning to perceive what they ought to decry, and what not. When President McCosh declares "it is useless [he might have said foolish] to tell the younger naturalists that there is no truth in the doctrine of development, for they know that there is truth, which is not to be set aside by denunciation;" when he intimates that religion may have neither title nor interest to insist that species have not developed from other species, in an advance from age to age, from lower to higher forms—and by his silence leads us to infer the same of science; and when again such a champion of Orthodoxy as Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, pertinently affirms that "the great question which divides theists from atheists, Christians from unbelievers, is this: Is development an intellectual process guided by God, or is it a blind process of unintelligible, unconscious force, which knows no end and adopts no means?" we may safely conclude that the time draws nigh when scientific hypotheses of the origin of species will be left to stand or fall upon their own merits, or at least be denounced with discrimination and some regard for the consequences. Dr. Hodge got his answer from a divine of his own denomination, who is also a botanist, a Rev. Dr. Brown, grandson of the doughty John Brown of Haddington—whose praise is in all the Calvinistic churches. He informed the audience that he unhesitatingly accepted the theory of development as a working hypothesis, and succinctly gave the reasons for doing so; and that he none the less held "the views advanced in the Shorter Catechism issued by the Westminster Assembly of Divines," enumerating the thirteen principal points in succession, adding that, while he did not hold "that God created all things out of nothing in the space of six days," the development doctrine was not responsible for the abandonment of that dogma. Finally, he ventured to anticipate "that the confirmation or general adoption of the hypothesis of development will ultimately exercise a beneficial influence on religion." The only note of a contrary tenor, so far as the daily report shows, was from Dr. Dawson, who appears still to hold that the Darwinian theory logically leads to atheism; that, "as regards varieties, Darwin is well enough; but, as regards species, I don't believe in it, because it comes in contact with the Bible." He has to draw the line somewhere, so he draws it at species. As to natural selection, "it is not science at all—only a bad philosophy." This is said of what an older naturalist (as quoted in another article, in which we have already referred to Dr. Dawson's view) declares to be neither a theory nor an hypothesis, but the expression of a necessary fact.—Nation.

Poetry.

MAKE THE BEST OF LIFE.

What's the use of always fretting
Over ills that can't be cured?
What's the use of finding fault with
What we know must be endured?

Does it make life's burdens lighter
If we grumble 'neath their load?
Does it make life's pathway smoother
If we fret about the road?

Better use our time than fill it
Full of sighs and vain regrets
Over some imagined blunder,
As does he who always frets.

Storms will follow every sunshine,
Grief be mixed with every joy;
And 'tis best that it should be so;
Gold's too soft without alloy.

"Half our trouble's our invention,"
We're to blame for half our strife;
Then if life is what we make it,
Why not make the best of life?

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up in all 4,095 names; the "Massachusetts Petition," 8,173.

Two new Liberal Leagues are reported this week: one in New York City, and the other in St. Joseph, Missouri. Further particulars will be found among the "Communications."

Rev. Dr. Curry, editor of the New York Christian Advocate, is hauled over the coals for heresy by the Northwestern Christian Advocate, for doubting the resurrection of the body. When the "advocates" of Christianity fall out, what is to become of the advocated?

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been received since last week as follows: From some town not designated, a list of 287 names, headed by A. R. Hardy; from Geo. H. Foster, Boston, 55; from John C. Waters, Millbury, 52. Total for the week—394.

A Boston paper states that, at a recent meeting of Catholic clergymen (in some place not named), "$70,000 were pledged for a new bishop's residence." It is one of the prospective beauties of church-exemption from taxation that every bishop shall have his episcopal palace.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" since last week have been received as follows: From Marc Thrane, Kenosha, Wis., 63; from John H. Ricker, Okaman, Minn., 50; from Z. B. Martin, East Foxboro, Mass., 17; from Dr. J. H. York, Dover, N. H., 13. Total for the week—143.

The clause providing for the future taxation of exempted property, inserted by the Constitutional Commission of New Jersey in the proposed new Constitution of that State, was stricken out in the Senate, only one vote being cast in favor of its retention. Is any further proof desired that the organization of Liberal Leagues is greatly needed?

"The chief causes of the low morality of savages, as judged by our standards," says Mr. Darwin, in the Descent of Man [vol. 2, p. 93], "are, firstly, the confinement of sympathy to the same tribe," etc. This is also the great evil of sectarianism, which, by limiting fellowship on account of differences of creed, checks sympathy, and thereby fosters a thousand immoralities.

One of the most active and efficient liberal organizations of the country is the Radical Club of Philadelphia. Its president is Mr. Edward M. Davis, who is also president of the Citizen's Suffrage Association. At its meeting of February 25, Mrs. Stanton read a paper on what she termed the "Woman's Whiskey War," criticising the prayer-crusade in a very original manner, and using these excellent words among others: "There is a better way to a higher civilization than this, and that is to organize the faith, enthusiasm, spirituality, and moral power of woman, and, in combination with the best qualities of manhood, incorporate it with the laws and constitutions of this republic."

The opening lecture of this issue of The Index is certainly a long one, and there will be no offence taken if the majority of our readers pass it over as even more dry than long. Nevertheless we cherish the hope that a few of them may be sufficiently interested in the constructive side of free religion to read carefully what is believed to be a thoroughly constructive paper, and one that illustrates the kind and method of construction favored by science. We suppose the cry of "Destructive! Destructive!" will still resound with unabated vigor. But we are grateful to the discerning few who recognize the constructive tendencies of The Index in all its work, however iconoclastic it may appear to the superficially-minded. Their appreciative sympathy comes sometimes in forms so modest as even to conceal the writers' names; but even thus it gives new strength to jaded energies, and stimulates to further effort.

In the London National Reformer of February 15, we find the following announcement of a course of lectures by Charles Bradlaugh, who, as our readers are aware, returned suddenly to England on the dissolution of Parliament:—

SPECIAL NOTICE.

MR. BRADLAUGH WILL LECTURE

On Tuesday, February 17th, at 8 P. M., at the New Hall of Science, London, for the Secular Benevolent Fund; subject, My American Journey.

Every Sunday morning and evening during March, at the New Hall of Science, 142, Old Street, London.

Mornings, at 11 o'clock precisely:—

March 1st, The New Parliament.
March 8th, Joseph Arch, the Agricultural Laborer, and Emigration; with Views as to the Advisability of Emigrating to the United States.
March 15th, The Labor Question in America: East, West, and South. Something about the Grangers and Trades' Unions.
March 22nd, The American Anti-Slavery Struggle; with Sketches of Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and Theodore Parker.
March 29th, Benjamin Disraeli.

Evenings, at 7 o'clock precisely:—

March 1st, John Stuart Mill.
March 8th, Heinrich Heine.
March 15th, The Free Religious Movement in America, and O. B. Frothingham.
March 22nd, The Existence of God. A Reply to Francis E. Abbot, of The Index.
March 29th, Theory of Volition.

The old Monthly Religious Magazine comes out this month with a new name as the Unitarian Review and Religious Magazine, under the management of a new editor, Rev. Charles Lowe. It is intended to make this periodical fill the place left vacant by the demise of the Christian Examiner a few years ago, and to furnish a worthy medium for the publication of articles embodying the best thought and highest scholarship of the Unitarian denomination. We desire to offer our heartiest and most cordial welcome to the new Review. The first number gives promise of real and high excellence in the carrying out of its adopted plan. In his catholic and sincere Prospectus, the editor states the principles that are to govern his course with the most commendable frankness; and while these principles are not broad enough to satisfy fully the friends of free religion, they are sufficiently broad to command from them a great deal of honest sympathy. Mr. Lowe says that, "within the limits of Christian belief, we shall encourage honest inquiry and the honest expression of any matured conviction." There are many excellent minds that ask no more liberty than this; and they are to be congratulated on now possessing an organ for the publication of their best productions. The limits being honestly and openly admitted, no one has any right to complain; whoever wants more liberty will of course go elsewhere. But meanwhile we expect a great deal of admirable work from those who will write for the Unitarian Review; and Professor Everett's able paper on "Mysticism" we welcome as probably the precursor of many others of equal beauty and thoughtfulness. The review of recent theological publications is very interesting; and the number is readable throughout. It is a great gain all around when ambiguity of position is abandoned for a definite and comprehensible standpoint; and we hope the new Review will gradually lead the Unitarian denomination to recognize and avow the fact that their liberty is necessarily within Christian limits. Between Christianity and unlimited freedom of thought one must choose; and sooner or later this necessity will be universally perceived. For further particulars of the new Review, address Leonard C. Bowles, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston.

WHY SHOULD WOMEN VOTE?

A very vigorous assault on the theory that women are justly entitled to the suffrage is made in another column of this issue of The Index by "C. P." We confess no little admiration of the intellectual force, the manly directness, and the bold tone of his article; and we freely admit the propriety of his demand that we render solid "radical reasons" for saying that women have a right to the ballot. Our advocacy of this right rests on nothing but reasons; and these we are perfectly willing to give.

"C. P." sums up his own arguments as follows:—

"1. That government is based upon force, and nothing else.

"2. That taxation is based on protection, not on representation.

"3. That suffrage is based on personal liability to the State, not on taxation."

Our answers to these arguments may be put thus:—

1. If government has no basis but force, it has no business to exist, and the first of all reforms will be to abolish it. It is a very unscientific political philosophy which can find no better justification for government than this. We should give a very different account of the matter, in this way. By virtue of a nature which he did not make and can never unmake, man is a social being; that is, society is his natural state. What is society? An aggregation of individuals, each with the natural right to life, liberty, and the means of development. The only limitation of these rights of the individual is that which grows out of the equal rights of all other individuals. Hence arises the State; that is, the political organization of society for the purpose of protecting the enjoyment of these rights by all individuals, within the limitations they mutually impose. The State is thus founded on the social nature of man as an intellectual and moral being with rights and duties, who must exist in a state of constant association with his fellows. If all individuals knew and respected the exact point where their own rights cease and those of others begin,—or if the public opinion of the majority had already become a restraining influence potent enough to prevent all violations of others' rights by those who were not self-restrained,—then we should have the great social organism called the State existing with its executive arm in abeyance; that is, with no actual government by force. It thus appears that society, or the State, results necessarily from the social relations called rights and duties, which necessarily exist wherever moral beings exist; that "government" is merely the executive arm of the State, enforcing respect for common rights, whenever lawless individuals would trample on them; and that the basis of government is the State, which is itself based on the socio-moral nature of man, and of which government is merely the executive arm. Instead, therefore, of government being "based on force, and nothing else," and therefore independent of all moral considerations, it is simply the collective force of society directed to the protection of all individual rights, and consequently the visible practical expression of its moral convictions.

2. It is of course to be admitted that taxation is based on protection. Taxation is simply the cost of protection; and the right to tax, on the part of the State, involves its duty to protect. If it protects impartially the rights of all individuals, it has the right to tax all individuals; if it fails to protect them to any extent, it forfeits the right to tax them to the same extent. But protection means the protection of "life, liberty, and property;" and unless all three are protected with equal fidelity, the right of the State to tax is impaired proportionally. Now it is the result of the world's experience hitherto that any unrepresented class fails to secure the full protection it is entitled to receive in return for the taxes it pays. Class legislation is always defective in the protection it affords; and this holds true of male legislation with reference to women,—for proofs of which statement we refer to the multiplying protests of women themselves, in this country as well as abroad. It follows clearly enough that, when the State taxes the property of women at the same rate that it taxes that of men, it charges for more than it has a right to charge; and its bill may justly be disputed and protested against. How far this protest may wisely be carried, we do not profess to decide; the aggrieved parties must settle that question for themselves. But that Mr. and Mrs. Foster had a right to protest against the taxation at full rates of their jointly owned homestead, we consider self-evident; and that the State was guilty of a gross outrage in collecting its taxes by a forced sale, when the amount of taxes demanded was in excess of the amount of protection afforded, is equally self-evident. Since when has it been thought that the State, because it is strong, has a right to collect unjust taxes by selling the homesteads of those who are weak? The State has no right to tax where it does not protect; it does not protect fully the liberties of any citizen to whom it refuses suffrage, and therefore representation; and the Fosters had a just cause for protest, when they were taxed for more protection than they received. It is true that they were justly holden for part of these taxes, corresponding to the amount of protection they had received in fact; though it might be hard to determine the exact sum due. But the withholding of the ballot from Mrs. Foster was the withholding of a portion of the protection for which she was taxed in full; and the State was guilty of oppression, when it sold her home because she refused to pay the gross amount of the taxes until they had been fully earned by the State.

3. Suffrage is not directly based on taxation, it is true; but neither is it based on "personal liability to the State." When "C. P." argues that a "man has a personal right to vote as an equivalent to his personal liability to the State," he throws overboard the fundamental principle of republicanism, that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." This "consent of the governed" is suffrage; and the right of suffrage cannot be derived from what it has itself created. "C. P." would derive "man's personal right to vote" from the government; whereas the government was founded simply to protect this and other personal rights, which were pre-existent. Furthermore, his statement that "the protection that property receives is an equivalent for taxation" is not only incorrect, but unconstitutional; for the Constitution of Massachusetts, as quoted in THE INDEX for February 26, expressly specifies protection of "life, liberty, and property" as its equivalent. As to personal liability to the State, no citizen is held for service he cannot render, but only for such as he can render. A man is not disfranchised because he is physically unfit for military service; why should a woman be? It is not a question of liability or of service; it is a question of personal or natural rights. Society consists of women as well as men; their lives, their liberties, their properties, are just as sacred as those of men; they have precisely the same right to vote that men have, as the only means of providing against unjust class legislation; they are subject to full taxation, and are entitled to full protection, which includes full recognition as members, equal with men, of the State. These are the reasons why women should vote.

THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

The following appears in the Christian Register of February 14. I quote it, not because it is of much importance to anybody but myself what I think or do not think, but because the point at issue is quite important:—

"Col. Higginson seems to think that Humanitarians have no right to call themselves Christians, and intimates that he felt bound to give up the Christian name because he 'held Jesus Christ to be a man.' But Samuel J. May claimed that Humanitarianism is the truest Christianity, and he was just as 'honest' and fearless as Col. Higginson himself. We cannot imagine anything more absurd than a denial that Dr. Furness is a Christian. In nearly nineteen hundred years Jesus has had no truer follower or more devoted disciple. For half a century, with rare concentration, and increasing satisfaction and delight, he has preached 'as the truth is in Jesus.'"

Now I have never undertaken to decide, nor have I ever hinted, what name Dr. Furness or Rev. S. J. May should bear; for I do not profess to know their opinions. I do profess to know my own, and I know that it would not be quite honest in me to call myself a Christian, although it might save some trouble and some loss of popularity or profit. But mark how singular the reversal of the position assigned to radicals! Formerly we were denounced and satirized if we claimed the Christian name,—as if it were so much stolen goods. Now, if we say, "Certainly; the goods are not mine; I do not claim them," the same persons turn upon us, and complain that we do injustice to other honest men who do claim them. Very well; let each man claim what is his own; but do not reproach him for taking it if he takes it, and for leaving it if he leaves it.

The whole tradition of the Christian Church, even down to this modern sect of Unitarianism, justifies those among us who prefer not to claim the Christian name. Referring, for instance, to a sermon by Rev. Dr. Lothrop, October 30, 1842, and quite famous in its day, on "The Christian Name and the Christian Character," I find the subject very fully discussed. It was preached in answer to a letter requesting Dr. Lothrop to discuss these two points, the controversy with Theodore Parker being then at its height. The sermon states the first point as follows: "The question is, What measure of faith gives a right or a claim to be ranked among Christian believers, to be classed under the general name of Christian?" The preacher sums up the answer as follows:—

"This leads us back to the definition I have already given, that Christianity is a religion of facts, a positive and authoritative revelation, resting upon incontrovertible facts. If this be the great comprehensive definition of Christianity, the answer to the question proposed is easy and direct. Whoever assents to this proposition, and receives the Gospel as historically true; whoever, with the Apostle in the text, acknowledges Jesus to be 'the Christ,' an authoritative 'teacher come from God,' his master in religious truth and moral duty, in the deep things of the spirit and in the conduct of every day, and goes with reverence to the record of his life and teachings, as to the fountain that can alone supply the spiritual wants of the soul,—whoever does this has a right to the Christian name, a claim to have that name conceded to him by others, though his creed, his interpretation of these records, and the doctrines he deduces from them differ widely from theirs. This I conceive to be the broad and distinctive foundation of Christian faith. All who stand upon this foundation I am ready to acknowledge as Christians. Let their creed be what it may, if they go to the teachings of Christ, to the New Testament as a record of facts, for authority and proof to establish and sustain that creed, I call them Christians, embraced among the disciples of Christ. More than this I am not disposed to demand; less than this I dare not concede as sufficient. If a man merely bow to Christ as an extraordinary religious genius, whose character, though distinguished for its moral elevation and purity, was yet marked, he thinks, by some inconsistencies and imperfections, which, however, he is willing to overlook as, 'considering the youth of the man, very venial errors;' if he does not regard him as invested with any direct divine authority, as no more inspired than we all may be, 'if we will pay the price;' if he place Jesus Christ and the Scriptures upon the same platform with Plato and Socrates and their writings, and receives and approves his instruction simply because he thinks them pure and good, the best he finds,—if this is the extent of his faith and acknowledgments, I am not prepared to give such latitude to the appellation of Christian, so to destroy all meaning and force in it, as to apply it to him. Christianity is either a direct divine revelation, or it is not. It is historically true, or historically false. If it be a divine revelation, historically true, it must be admitted to demand a more respectful acknowledgment than simply that its system of ethics is pure and its author an extraordinary religious genius; and if a man deem it historically false, and no more directly a revelation than the teachings of all eminently gifted minds are a revelation, there seems to me neither reason nor propriety in his claiming to be, or wishing to be called, a Christian believer."

This seems to me to be very sensible doctrine; and I, for one, have for many years endeavored to act upon it, and not to claim any name that did not justly belong to me. Theodore Parker thought differently, and preferred to retain the name Christian,—which I thought a pity. But it seems also a pity that the sects which once held Dr. Lothrop's view should now object to it when radicals act upon it, thus leaving both parties in the position of those Roman Catholic and Protestant lovers who mutually converted each other, and found themselves still hopelessly separated.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—We are just passing through two phases of excitement — one political, the other religious. I should like to say a few words on each of these matters, because they are interesting to us on both sides of the Atlantic.

You will have heard all about the ejection of the Liberals and the return of the Conservatives to power. By many persons this is deemed to be little less than a disgraceful retrogression on the part of Great Britain. But this is not the opinion of some of the most stanch Liberals, who are not in the least dismayed by their temporary and apparent defeat. The truth is that the names Liberal and Conservative no longer stand for exactly the same opinions as those which they at first represented.

A very large proportion of those called Conservatives and Liberals are no longer opposed to each other, but are nearly identical in views and aims.

If only the measures brought forward are not made "party questions," we shall see Liberals and Conservatives voting on the same side, provided they are manifestly for the public good. Such a change will at first hamper a cabinet composed of men brought up under the old school of parliamentary procedure, and must undermine the power of those who are unable to adapt themselves to the new order of things. But if there be a decent amount of wisdom and discernment in our new ministers, they will have the golden opportunity to introduce and to carry such reforms as the best men on both sides alike desire.

The question of Mr. Gladstone's defeat must be kept separate from that of the Liberal party. The country had got pretty tired of him, and disliked his besetting sin of flirting with the leaders of extreme opinion on all sides, and then of leaving them in the lurch.

The triumph of the Conservatives is traceable mainly to the disintegration of the Liberals themselves, who present every shade of opinion, down to what Englishmen at heart abhor—Radicalism and Democracy. Hence the party, as a party, did not know its own mind, and a period of obscuration and retirement became necessary.

On one point, especially, the Liberals were fatally divided: namely, on the question of Religious Education,—some going all lengths short of giving up the Bible, and others clamoring that the Bible too should be excluded from the national schools. This is quite enough to account for the result of the late elections; and, if I mistake not, the agitation will continue to harass our political leaders for some time to come. The end—whenever it may be—must be the triumph of that principle which is now planted deep in the hearts of so many just men—that it is iniquitous to lend the sanction of State authority, or to give the support of State funds, to any particular set of religious opinions. That is one lesson learned, and it cannot be unlearned; time must bring its triumph.

This is the first General Election since the introduction of the ballot, and I cannot describe the feelings of shame and humiliation with which—for the first time in my life—I voted like a coward, and was forbidden to divulge the names of the men for whom I voted.

Bribery is a stigma which will take generations to wipe out from our English honor. The ballot is our confession that we are a set of knaves and cowards; that we would sell our country for gold; that we dare not speak our honest minds!

It may be necessary—no doubt it was necessary; but all the more to our national disgrace. I am told that it is almost futile in stopping bribery; and that hundreds of so-called "agents" received a guinea a day for—doing nothing!

Well, we have sins to repent of indeed; and the Church "Mission" which was held in London this week might have been worthily employed in dealing with so patent a vice as the bribery going on under our very eyes. Not so, however, think the ministers of religion. They don't care how people live in the week day as long as they come to church on the Sunday. It matters not what corruption is eating out the core of the people's honesty, purity, and truthfulness, so long as they come to the Sacrament, and obey the "spiritual" injunctions of their priest.

This is unhappily no new thing in England or in America; but it is a new thing—to be hailed with exceeding thankfulness — that this gigantic shame should be openly assailed by some important clergymen, and through the columns of the Times. To us, who have so long labored, as it were, against the stream, it is indeed refreshing to see men's eyes opening to the religious frauds which have been practised; and their lips denouncing, as a mockery of true religion, that which hierarchs and priests have recommended.

I know how you feel upon all such matters, and I am sure it would please you to know of any indication, however small in itself, if it be only clear, that the tide is turning.

Just as the Liberals in politics wisely accept as a beneficial change the accession of Conservatives to temporary power; so do the Liberals in theology welcome even the ginger-bread displays of church-missions and the parade of sacerdotal sensationalism, as means whereby the eyes of the people will be opened and their apathy will be shaken off. "Give them plenty of rope," etc.; if hanging be not the fatal issue to their increased liberty for antics, it will be because they will have put off the follies of children and put on the sobriety and earnestness of men.

Certain it is that the Conservatives who go in for Church and State are the deadly foes of the pernicious nonsense of sacerdotalism, and it may yet be reserved for the party of retrogression to accomplish one of the greatest works of progress: namely, the Second Reformation of the Church of England.

This, by the way, reminds me of another "sign of the times." The Quarterly Review—of all English reviews!—has an article on sacerdotalism which would have done honor to the Westminster Review. Higher praise I could not invent.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

NATURE'S LAWS IN HUMAN LIFE: an Exposition of Spiritualism; embracing the Various Opinions of Extremists, pro and con; together with the Author's Experience. By the author of Vital Magnetic Cure. Boston: William White & Co. 1873.

It is not easy to perceive the claim of this work to the title, Nature's Laws in Human Life. There is nothing of scientific analysis of the laws of Nature, or of their application to human life. As an exposition of Spiritualism, it has nothing new. The author gives his own experience at length; but (supposing it to be more convincing than that of Spiritualists generally, which it is not) it brings with it little weight, since he presents himself to the reader entirely incognito, and what there is in his character behind this veil, that might induce credence or its opposite, is entirely unknown. That there is something remarkable underlying the phenomena of what is called Spiritualism is true; but that these phenomena are attributable to the action of disembodied human beings remains yet to be proved to the mass of ingenuous and scientific minds; and this volume contains no fresh evidences of the justice of such a claim. Granting Spiritualism to be true, it is a most uncertain guide, according to the acknowledgments of its own advocates. This author allows that there is a strong tendency to credulity among its adherents; that the utterances of spirits cannot be accepted as authority; and that there are many impostors in the list of those who set themselves up as mediums of communication between the seen and the unseen. Yet he refers to Mr. J. V. Mansfield as a writing medium, widely known, who "was compelled by the higher powers to adopt the practice of answering sealed letters as a regular business," and who, "in obedience to the impulse given him, has been engaged for a period of fifteen years, with the most successful and satisfactory results."

Now according to the following statement, which is testimony at first-hand, it would appear that he might have included this man in his class of impostors, and that the recognition of him as trustworthy is only another illustration of human credulity.

About a dozen years since, a lady who was anxious to get evidence of spirit-communication was recommended by a distinguished Spiritualist to apply to Mr. Mansfield, as one through whom she could undoubtedly obtain convincing proof of its truth. She accordingly enclosed to him a sealed letter, addressed to a deceased friend. In due time, she received from him an answer, purporting to come from the spirit of this friend. But not a trace of his individuality was to be found in the epistle. He had been distinguished for his genius, and for great freshness and originality of expression. This professed communication consisted of the most insipid platitudes. So far as any facts were concerned which could not be made out of hints in the letter sent, all reference to them, even in minute points, was traceable, with exact correspondence, to what had appeared in print. Mr. Mansfield, finding that the lady had received no satisfaction, requested her to try again. She did so, addressing this time one of whom it was known the professed medium could have no knowledge, but referring slightly to two or three points which would serve as tests of identity. In reply came an answer from Mr. Mansfield, in his own person, saying that the spirit addressed had appeared, and that there was something in her appearance suggestive of this and that,—the identical things referred to in the letter; but she could not control the medium so as to communicate anything. These failures, it is well known, can be explained away by the usual spiritualistic philosophy. But the sequel in connection with these results is that to which attention is chiefly invited.

These "unsealed letters," upon which reiterated emphasis had been placed, were faithfully returned "intact" to the writer. Before throwing them aside, she thought she would open them. On seeking to draw the folded sheet from its envelope, she found it was held in, although it had ample room, and was not at all cramped. Surprised, but determined not to be baffled, she redoubled her effort, and at length something suddenly gave way, and the sheet came out smoothly. She then discovered upon one side of it a little mass which seemed to be the hardened result of some adhesive fluid. On laying open the envelope, there was found, at a point exactly corresponding to the mark on the sheet, a spot of the same appearance, from which it appeared the other had been broken. On a close inspection of the same end of the envelope there was found a slight difference in color between its sealing matter and that of the other end. All this was true, in a general way, in regard to both letters. The conviction was irresistible that the letters had been opened, by skilfull unsealing one end of the envelope, and that in resealing a little excess of fluid had been used, which, on pressing the two surfaces, had been exuded upon the sheet within. The inference was that, if there was imposture in one case, there might be in all, the sleight-of-hand acquired being adequate to any emergency.

Mr. Mansfield had requested the lady to give him her impressions as to the result of the experiment. She thereupon wrote to him that, in the letters returned, she had found evidence, to her mind as conclusive as that on which persons had been convicted of capital crimes, that the letters had been opened; and that she could put no other construction upon his transactions than that he was getting money on false pretences. Although he had expressed a very kindly interest in convincing her of the truths of Spiritualism, to this he made no reply. A few weeks afterwards, she heard that he had suddenly disappeared from Boston, and had taken up his residence the whole width of the continent therefrom! A. H.

NEW YORK LIBERAL LEAGUE.

NEW YORK, March 6, 1874.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am requested by its officers to notify you of the formation of a Liberal League of New York City, of which Mr. James B. Brown, President of the New York Plough Company, has been unanimously elected President, and Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of Truth Seeker, Secretary; and that the first regular meeting will be held at the private parlors, No. 207 East Forty-fifth Street, on Friday evening, March 20, at half-past seven, P.M. All interested are especially invited to be present. New members are solicited.

M. ALTMAN.

ST. JOSEPH LIBERAL LEAGUE.

ST. JOSEPH, BUCHANAN CO., MO., Mar. 3, 1874.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—The following resolution was adopted on Sunday last by the Liberal League of this place:—

"Resolved, That this League enter into correspondence with other liberal organizations throughout the country, for the purpose of coöperation, and the eliciting of such information concerning our mutual purposes as may prove mutually beneficial to us."

My object in writing to you, Mr. Abbot, is, first, that you may know we have an organization known as the St. Joseph Liberal League; secondly, that we have adopted your "Demands of Liberalism," "Form of Local Organization," and "Articles of Agreement;" also an excellent code of By-Laws and Rules of Order. The first meeting was called for February 10, at which ten persons only attended. We have now ninety-one (91) members, a permanent organization, and an increasing interest—as our friends at the other end of the line have it—in its behalf. We propose to institute a Liberal library and a Liberal Sunday-school. We desire any information in regard to other organizations of this character—how long they have been in operation, and what are their results so far.

With respect, very truly yours,

T. H. KENNEDY, Secretary.

P. S.—If you call the attention of other organizations, through THE INDEX, to the above, you will oblige by requesting them to communicate with us direct. T. H. K.

[The best way to call attention to the wishes of the St. Joseph League seems to be to publish Mr. Kennedy's letter. We trust the new Leagues now rapidly starting up will all look upon work rather than talk as their "being's end and aim;" in which case they will be astonished to find how much can be achieved by a few determined spirits in the enlargement of religious freedom.—ED.]

ARGUMENTS AGAINST WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Feb. 28, 1874.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I regret to say that I take exception to every line of your paragraph on the Foster sale, in the last INDEX.

It is no humiliation for the State to collect an unpaid tax, but simply justice to other tax-payers. The sole cause of the sale was the non-payment of the tax, without reference to the reason. Although the Fosters had deliberately placed themselves in this position, they were no more harshly dealt with than others who are unable from poverty to pay their tax. They have the privilege of redeeming within two years, upon payment of interest and expenses, without any penalty for their rebellion. The State has not treated them as "criminals," and you have no warrant or excuse for such an assertion. Every individual in the State has quite as good reason for refusing to pay a tax,—you and I because churches are exempted, Catholics because the money goes to support public schools, and so on. We all have the "sacred right of revolution," but at our own risk; for the State has the equally sacred duty of enforcing its authority.

Taxation and representation have no more necessary connection with each other than morality and Christianity. Taxation without representation is not tyranny; you demolish that argument yourself, on this same page of THE INDEX.

If simply owning property and being taxed does not give a vote to a man, why should it to a woman? What personal right has woman to suffrage? Man has a personal right to vote as an equivalent to his personal liability to the State. It is not many years since every man in this country understood perfectly well what this liability meant: that he did not have the rights of citizenship for nothing, but that the State had a personal claim on him which it meant to enforce.

"If one woman demands her fair share of political power, the community is bound to respect the claim." Agreed. All should have a fair share, whether demanded or not. But though all this sounds so well, it means absolutely nothing, for the practical question to be decided is not whether we shall do right or wrong, but, "What is the right thing to do?" What is woman's fair share? Surely not a man's share, for she cannot do a man's part. The protection that property receives is an equivalent for taxation, and the personal protection that woman receives from the State, with her exemption from personal liability, is sufficient equivalent for the service she can give the State. It is a favorite argument with woman-suffragists, that an ignorant woman has as much right to vote as an ignorant man; but the difference is very great. The ignorant man is a power in the State; no government in the world can overlook him; he must either have a voice in the State, or he must be kept out by force. One ignorant man must be hired, armed, and drilled to keep down another. In this country, it is both justice and policy to give him a vote, for the State claims personal service from him, and it is far safer to give him an interest in the State than to have him unrepresented, disaffected, and therefore dangerous. But there is no reason either in justice or policy for giving the ignorant woman a right to vote. She can do no good with it; she can do no harm without it. She can make no return to the State for the ballot, if it is given her, and she cannot be dangerous to the State if it is withheld. She does not enter into political consideration at all, and there is no reason why she should.

"Give women the right to vote." A simple and persistent appeal is woman's strongest argument always; but it is not nearly so convincing from a man. Since you have made a public demand for the suffrage, it is only fair that you should give your reasons; not mere "glittering generalities," or appeals to abstract right and justice, but radical reasons, practically applied, so as to show what is right and why it is right. My arguments are:—

1. That government is based upon force, and nothing else.

2. That taxation is based on protection, not on representation.

3. That suffrage is based on personal liability to the State, not on taxation.

Yours truly, C. P.

P. S.—One more word. Supposing churches are taxed, and some churches should from purely conscientious motives refuse to pay the tax, would not the State be justified in collecting even by the sale of the altar itself? C. P.

PROFESSOR NEWMAN'S STRICTURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Allow me to say that I feel truly aggrieved by the charge made in the late essay of Prof. Newman of "the endless scoffs of THE INDEX against Christians." I have been a faithful reader of THE INDEX from the first, and it seems to me there has never appeared upon its pages anything which can justify such a sweeping and serious accusation. In taking a stand "squarely outside of Christianity," great plainness of speech has of course been required to explain the reasons of that position; and Christianity has, perhaps, been treated with no more and no less reverence than any other form of religion. It may be conceded, also, that there has occasionally been a little more of the element of sarcasm than is agreeable to persons of some temperaments. But all this is a very different thing from scoffs; and it seems a sad misunderstanding of the whole tone of the paper, and a great injustice, to apply such an opprobrious term to any of its utterances.

A charge made against THE INDEX from some other quarters is that it is wanting in charity and sympathy. I must say that it has never presented itself thus to me, and that I am very much puzzled to find on what ground such an impression rests. It is true, always, that in attacking any error or wrong, the subject at hand necessarily engrosses the chief attention, and one cannot stop at every period to present all the palliating considerations, and all the sympathy that may be felt for those who see their most cherished ideas set aside. But one who has been a close observer of the entire spirit of the paper cannot fail to have perceived the undercurrent of kindly, generous, and courteous feeling, which would do full justice to the right of freedom of opinion, and treat with respect and deference the honest convictions of all. So, as to the complaint that it is iconoclastic, and that it presents nothing constructive to rest upon, it would be well that all impressed with such an idea should revert to its numerous statements in the past, particularly to the thoughts condensed in the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles."

The truth is, there pervades THE INDEX a more penetrating and a deeper philosophical insight into the radical elements of things than is often found; consequently, it is impelled to attack errors at their roots. In this respect, being far in advance of the times, it fails to get a full understanding and a just sympathy, even from those who, in many particulars, are in accord with its principles. T.

THE LAW OF SELF-PERFECTION.

Mr. O. B. Frothingham, in his excellent sermon on "Religion and a Religion," says: "Mr. Abbot's conception of religion may be severely philosophical, but it strikes the ordinary mind as bleak and desolating."

Can the "ordinary mind," or man, escape the law which impels him "to perfect himself"? Or will he or she?

Do not all the various believers described by Mr. Frothingham make that effort, according to their various ideals of perfection?

The ordinary mind may not be able to comprehend the definition of Mr. Samuel Johnson—"The natural attraction of mind as finite to mind as infinite;" or Mr. Frothingham's "third description of religion"—"Religion is the close relation of the separate part to its whole." But if any one thinks the definition of Mr. Abbot ever so "bleak and desolating," the humblest individual can not help acting in accordance with that logical conception, any more than any one of us can help revolving with mother earth around the sun.

Mr. Johnson's definition leaves the atheist and materialist out in the cold; how can they acknowl edge an attraction to the infinite mind? Yet are they void of all religion? Have they, too, no warm faith and hope? Do they not make the "effort to perfect themselves"? They obey the same laws which the theist obeys; and will they refuse to accept the existence after death when they come to it?

Many of our religious teachers seem to have the idea that the common people need a sentimental definition of their inherent attribute.

Religion requires action rather than words and sentimentalities; and are we able to act without an effort?

Free Religion seems to me the effort, or, if that is too "bleak and desolating," the desire, of honest reasoning men and women to free religion from the corruptions and pollutions which the speculators and usurers of historical religion have brought upon it. If that purification is accomplished, men will be indeed "listening to the still, sad music of humanity," and will make the effort to produce more cheerfulness and harmony. CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N. H., February 22, 1874.

"THE GALLEY SLAVE."

HYDE PARK, Mass., March 3, 1874.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have just finished one of the most beautiful of stories, The Galley Slave, by Zschokke. I was so fortunate as to get it from the Boston Public Library last week; and I have received from it so much benefit and delight that I wish, through THE INDEX, to make it known to those of your readers who have not already read it.

I have believed for many years that the book most needed by me comes to me at the right time; and, at the risk of being thought rather sentimental, I must say that I feel as though an angel from a world where the needs of the soul are better known than in this had reached down and placed this delightful book in my hands. I can only hope that, if there are others under as dark a cloud as I have been, The Galley Slave may lift them, as it has me, from darkness into the light of God and Immortality.

Truly yours, L. L. G.

THE ST. LOUIS REVIVAL.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Feb. 27, 1874.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—For the past seven weeks there has been a revival going on here under the leadership of a man called Hammond. They have, among other things, been having out-door meetings, and assistance has been given by all the different denominations except the Catholic, Episcopal, and Unitarians. Among the most prominent acolytes of this Hammond is a man named Burlingame, parson of a Baptist church on Sixth and Locust Streets. On Sunday last they had a praying, singing, and exhorting meeting on Green Street,—the abode of the rowdies and prostitutes, on which occasion they were invited to drink, and jeered at. In fact the behavior of the people there was any thing but reputable. A milkman drove up during the meeting, and commenced ringing his bell in order to summon his customers, when Burlingame, in a stentorian voice, ordered him to stop, and remarked with intense vulgarity: "That man has more water than milk in his pails; I would advise no one to buy any from him." Comment is unnecessary, except to remark that the vulgar rowdy and the vulgar parson are "Arcades ambo," and both have given a patent instance of blackguardism.

Yours truly, FREE-THINKER.

THE FREED-PEOPLE IN VIRGINIA.

LOTTSBURGH, Va., Feb. 22, 1874.

REV. P. FISK:

Dear Sir,—We are much gratified to receive your kind letter of the 14th, and will be happy to read THE INDEX you so generously donate us. It has not yet arrived, but we hope for the pleasure to receive it next mail. You have our very best thanks. It is delightful to have you so greatly interested in our work among these poor colored people. Yesterday, in our schoolhouse, we celebrated the birthday of Washington. The day was fine, thermometer at seventy-two degrees.

Our beautiful stars and stripes floated in the breeze over the schoolhouse, and eighty dark scholars, little and big, sung patriotic songs, and recited poems, and speeches, inside, all in nice, clean, holiday dress, that friends at the North have sent down to me. They were an interesting sight, and we could not but see that our human garden begins to show culture!

I wish you could hear a class of six recite "The Pied Piper." They did admirably.

Ida Lawson repeated the Fifteenth Psalm very handsomely. She is a little girl of ten. Harriet Porter gave the Thirty-fifth, in memory of its being read on the 4th of July, 1776, in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

Henry Washington and Jimmie Blackwell had a dialogue about "The Wonderful Machine" (meaning the human hand), and Charlotte Washington with Mary Ann Johnson recited a dialogue showing the value of pure air. We endeavor, in all ways, to infuse solid, practical, useful knowledge in the minds of all our people, parents and children. Our scholars have studied physiology enough now to enjoy open doors and windows to let in pure, fresh air.

They belong to a very warmth-loving race. We have distributed sacks and wraps enough, so with these ideas of pure, good air, they are intelligently ready to welcome the best air we can command.

It tests the scale of their progress. They used to shrug their shoulders wofully, and shrink in dismay, at the bare thought of cold air admitted in the schoolhouse.

Charles Wood came from ten miles "below" with six little people of his family. He said as soon as they got in sight of the flag, as they came over the hill, he "felt paid already for coming." "It did him so much good to see it." I don't suppose that in all Westmoreland County (Washington's birthplace), which joins us, a solitary flag waved yesterday. But we like to teach our children about him.

Again thanking you, I am respectfully yours,

S. HOLLEY.

A TRIAL FOR BLASPHEMY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In the sixth volume of the Athenæum, published in 1820, I find an article on the result of the trial of Richard Carlile for publishing the works of Thomas Paine and Elihu Palmer. The article is taken from the New Monthly Magazine. I do not think that the piece can be surpassed as a specimen of religious bigotry and fanaticism. A few extracts from this article, which so fairly illustrates the spirit of Christian charity, will doubtless be acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX:—

"We can only advert very briefly to an event which occurred during the present month, and which excited no inconsiderable share of public interest and curiosity. We allude to the trials of Carlile, the wretched vender of blasphemy. After a most patient and humane inquiry into the nature of his offence, and after he had been allowed, perhaps too freely, to reiterate his crime by the very nature of his defence, two successive juries found him guilty, for having published Paine's Age of Reason and Palmer's Principles of Nature. It is lamentable to think that he publicly boasted, during his trial, of having sold, since last January, about three thousand copies of the first most famous work."

"In our last digest we had to mention the trials of Carlile for blasphemy, and his conviction. We have now the pleasure of recording his punishment; namely, for publishing the Age of Reason, an imprisonment of two years in Dorchester jail, and a fine of one thousand pounds; for publishing Palmer's Principles of Nature, a further imprisonment of one year in the same jail, and a fine of five hundred pounds. At the expiration of his imprisonment, to enter into recognizances for his good behavior for life, himself in one thousand pounds, and two sureties in one hundred pounds each. Immediately after this sentence, a writ of levari facias was issued, under which all his property was seized, and his shop closed."

"With respect to the sentence pronounced upon this wretched man, we believe a culprit has never fallen under the penalties of the law from whose fate all sympathy is so utterly repelled. He has proved himself not only a daring, but an incorrigible, offender. He has betrayed no touch of shame or remorse during the whole of his profligate career. He took up blasphemy as a trade, and pursued the sordid traffic with a ravening appetite for gain which brands an odious quality of guilt upon his conduct. He glutted that appetite to the last moment, and even while he stood on Tuesday before the tribunals of his country, the very crime for which he was about to receive their indignant sentence was being perpetrated in his pestiferous den of sedition and impiety."

I forbear making any more extracts. Sufficient has been quoted to show the spirit which animated the writer. Remember, Liberals of America, that the trial of Richard Carlile took place in the year A.D. 1819. What is to prevent a similar trial from taking place in the year 1874? Remember that the spirit of bigotry is not dead, but only slumbers; and that it will awaken, endowed with additional vigor, when a fitting opportunity arrives. Yours truly,

THOMAS M. JOHNSON.

MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION.

FOURTH HEARING.

The remonstrants against any change in the present law, as regards the exemption of the property held by and for religious societies, appeared before the Committee on Just and Equal Taxation, and were heard at considerable length.

The Rev. Mr. Foote, of King's Chapel, appeared in behalf of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, which, he said, is one of the oldest charitable institutions in this city, and one which has perhaps done as much as any in this city to give it wide fame abroad for a wise, generous, philanthropic spirit. The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches has been in existence about forty years in Boston, and by legislative charter since 1829. It was founded by the Rev. Dr. Tuckerman. It began in a little ten-foot house toward the North End, and has expanded with the growth of the city, until now it holds four chapels and employs six male and female missionaries. It is the first institution of its kind in the world. The chapels are worth $150,000. By the act of Legislature, the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches was authorized to hold property amounting to an income of $7000, free from taxation, for charitable and religious purposes, beside the chapels. It holds, to-day, property amounting to $2000 annually. It costs to maintain the work of the Fraternity $15,000 a year. Several thousand dollars more are needed. The sum of $13,000 is raised by contribution from nine Unitarian churches, contributed for no selfish purpose of their own, but purely for charitable purposes. Four churches bear the heaviest burden of this contribution. The chapels are small, useful, and convenient, and are intended to maintain a free ministry to the poor of Boston. If they were taxed, the tax would be $1920. About the whole of the income of the vested property would be absorbed in paying the tax. Unless the resources were increased, taxation means cutting off the best missionary, as $1920 is about the sum paid him, or else a chapel would have to be sold in order to reduce the taxable property of the association. It cuts at both ends. It taxes the association, and imposes a tax on the churches which contribute to the Fraternity, and the very same people will have to pay other taxes for their churches at home. Boston could better afford to pay a subsidy to these chapels, on the ground that they are a direct economy to the city. They reduce its expenses. They educate hundreds of people out of intemperance, poverty, to self-respecting, law-abiding, tax-paying citizens.

The Hon. F. B. Crowninshield replied to the arguments of the City relating to the large amounts of property exempted under the present law. As nearly three-fourths of the real estate of the city was mortgaged, the city received double taxes upon that proportion of its real estate. In regard to the taxation of charitable institutions he did not wish to say anything. In regard to educational institutions he realized that the subject of education was dearest to the hearts of the people, and that Harvard College was almost the child of the Commonwealth. The charter of 1650 especially stipulated that its property shall not be taxed, and moreover exempted from certain civil obligations its officers and their servants. He greatly doubted if the City Solicitor fairly represented the sentiment of the citizens of Boston. He also denied that the property of Harvard College was all exempted from taxation, as when its buildings are all completed, now in process of erection, it will pay taxes on $1,200,000 of property. In regard to a piece of property in the Dorchester district, he explained that, although it was of value, and increasing in value, the college did not come into possession for nearly twenty years. In speaking of the land on Charles River, he denied that it was acquired with a view to speculation as a piece of building property. It was thought possible that in the future a public park would be formed from this property, and facilities for the boating interests of the college furnished. The Bussey Institution was then referred to. It had been improved so finely by the recent owner that the city of Roxbury passed a vote of thanks to him. In leaving this property to the college, Mr. Bussey desired to establish an agricultural department for the college. He fully appreciated the feeling of the tax assessor at not being able to get his hands on to this fine estate, but he thought in this case there was good reason for restraining this inclination. An abstract of the Bussey Bulletin was then read by the speaker to explain the practical working of the institution. As there is no possible income from this farm he could see no reason for taxing it. Annual expenditures will be made upon it of from $7000 to $9000 a year, for the purpose of making a beautiful park which the public will be allowed to enjoy. It would be equally just for the State to tax Boston Common. Every foot of land within miles of the Bussey estate will be increased in value by the proposed improvement in the estate. The city would gladly pay $1,000,000 for the estate to be used as a public park, but they are to have it merely for the taxes upon it.

Does the City Assessor want to tax Bunker Hill and Memorial Hall, at Cambridge, when it shall swallow that city? Shame upon it, said the speaker. Is there a man who desires to tax cemeteries? and yet why give them up to a parcel of dry bones? He preferred to have the Catholic churches built, even though he was a Protestant; they must have education, and must have such as they will receive. If the Chinese would come here and build a pagoda, he would vote to exempt it. Objects of beauty in architecture or statuary should be encouraged, and yet the City Assessor would probably feel happier if he could collect a tax on the beautiful equestrian statue of Washington. The whole gain to the city would be nothing by the proposed change; it would diminish the rate but not the taxes. The rate is now kept down and the valuation marked up, on the same principle that Johnny Laprive made $1000 before breakfast by marking his goods up. If the principle of repealing the present law is right, why not tax the streets, the gravestones in Granary Burying Ground, the statues, the harbor, and everything. Faneuil Hall and the portraits would bring in a little something, and the gravestones in the burying grounds would make good flaggings. He denied that Harvard College was exclusively for the rich, as no poor boy ever went there who did not get helped through somehow. Any man, black or white, who shows himself worthy is welcomed to the college. He estimated that the taxes on the property of the college would be about $48,000, and this amount could not be paid without taking it from the public in some way, either by restricting its working or by compelling its friends to make it up. The speaker closed with an earnest appeal for the continuance of the present law.

Mr. Thomas Lamb then testified against the policy of taxing charitable institutions. As the property of these institutions is invested in securities paying small returns, the rates of taxation would take from their income a very considerable proportion of their receipts. He could not believe that the change was seriously considered at the present time.

The Rev. Heman Lincoln testified as to his ideas of the true principles of taxation, claiming that revenue was the proper subject of taxation, and as churches and charitable institutions do not yield revenue they should be exempt. He replied to the argument that churches should pay for the protection afforded them by the State. Do they not make such return by the elevation of morals and checking of vice which they accomplish? Abolish all these, and would not the rate of taxation be materially increased in ten years? The hearing was then adjourned one week.—Globe, of March 6.

AN INTELLIGENT graduate of a Massachusetts school told the examiner that "Æsop was the author of Latin fables covered with hair, and sold his birthright for a mess of potash."

THE ONLY LAW by which women and men can be truly governed is the liberty of perfect development. You cannot know the sphere of any being until he has the liberty of choosing a sphere.—George William Curtis.

PRACTICE DOES not always make perfect. Curran, when told by his physician that he seemed to cough with more difficulty, replied: "That is odd enough, for I have been practising all night."

A LETTER was received not long ago, at Portsmouth, N. H., directed as follows: "Patrick Flynn, works in the mill of the same name of the steamer that sunk the Alabama—I forgot the name—United States of America." It reached the right man.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

"BEST IS THE CHEAPEST."

CORTICELLI
SPOOL SILK.

Size, Length, and Quality warranted.

Sold by leading Jobbers and Retailers.

NONOTUCK SILK CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS.

BOSTON OFFICE—No. 2 Bedford Street.

REASONS FOR USING THE UREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

CANTATA OF Esther, the Beautiful Queen, DRAMATIZED!!

Dramatized by Prof. Seager, who has brought out the Cantata in a large number of cities and towns, always to large, enthusiastic and profitable audiences. In its new form, Esther presents a spectacle of uncommon beauty, and even of splendor, with its brilliant Eastern dresses, &c. Music simple but spirited. Dresses and decorations easily procured.

Price 50 cents. $4.50 per dozen.

RIVER OF LIFE. Best Sunday-school song book.

ENLARGED EDITION OF Father Kemp's
Old Folks' Concert Tunes.

Father Kemp's "Old Folks" have sung to nine hundred audiences, and other organizations to at least as many more. These tunes are sure to attract both old and young. The present edition is enlarged to 96 pages, and a number of favorite "old" anthems, patriotic pieces, &c., are added.

Price 40 cents. $4 per dozen.

CHEERFUL VOICES. Best common school song book.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of retail price.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

BUST OF
THEODORE PARKER,
BY
SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent, that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

VOLUME 5. BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1874. WHOLE NO. 221.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

FANEUIL HALL, the "cradle of liberty," was tremulous with eloquent sorrow, last Saturday, for the loss of one of liberty's noblest advocates.

THE CATHOLIC papers say that "the holy Father is remarkably well." The Pope and the King never die—until the people get tired of them.

WHO SHALL succeed Mr. Sumner in the Senate? No man can fill his place; but may one take it who is as far above political contamination as he was!

THE STATE HOUSE, all the beautiful day last Sunday, stood in mute mourning for the death of the spotless statesman whose body lay in grand repose beneath its roof.

THE SUM OF ninety thousand dollars was appropriated by Boston, last year, to her Public Library. This year, it is proposed to add more than forty thousand dollars to that sum.

THE REPORT of the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor shows that, out of the 282,485 children in this State between five and twelve years of age, at least 25,000 do not receive the slightest education either in public or private schools!

MANY AND FITTING have been the words spoken by the orators of this State for Mr. Sumner. But the truest words of appreciation and honor which Massachusetts has for her great Senator cannot be spoken. They are so deep as to be voiceless.

THE SPEECH which J. B. Smith, the colored member of the House from Boston, tried to make but could not for the tears that choked his utterance, was the most eloquent of all those uttered in the Legislature on the life, character, and death of Charles Sumner.

WHAT A RARE opportunity Gen. Grant had to show his magnanimity and his wisdom, in nominating Charles Sumner to the vacant Chief Justiceship! Mr. Sumner very likely might not have accepted the position, but all the world knows how adequately he could have filled it.

THERE IS a movement towards liberty in the close-communion Baptist Church. A "Liberal Baptist Union" has been formed, which advocates open communion. It seems a trifling matter to be liberal about; but, then, we must remember that any movement in the right direction may have a small beginning.

ONE OF THE chaplains to Queen Victoria—Dr. Caird—was recently charged with "heresy" by the Glasgow Established Presbytery. Dr. Caird's "heresy" consisted in saying that "man was not responsible for his religious belief." The charge was not sustained in the Presbytery, but an appeal was taken to the Synod.

THE Catholic Review calls upon "all Catholics to pray to St. Joseph," during the month of March (which somehow or other seems to be this saint's month), "for the deliverance of Pius IX, and the triumph of the Church." If it is in the power of St. Joseph to do any favor to that respectable old gentleman who lives in the Vatican, we sincerely hope he will.

THE National Republican of Washington, D. C., had the following notice in its issue of March 9:—

"Canon Kingsley, of the Church of England, author of Alton Locke and Hypatia, will perform the services of Chaplain to the House of Representatives, at 12 o'clock, to-day."

Mr. Kingsley "performed" with the Lord's Prayer, and his "performance" seems to have given great satisfaction to every one.

AMONG MR. SUMNER'S last few words he said: "Tell Emerson I love and revere him." And Judge Hoar, who held the Senator's hand, and to whom the words were addressed, replied: "I will. And I have heard him say that you had the whitest soul he ever knew." The great Senator's soul was, indeed, white and pure, and might well be in loving sympathy with the pure, white soul of Mr. Emerson.

THE TRIBUTES which the poor and private have paid to Mr. Sumner's memory are among the most touching incidents of his death. The colored people have shed genuine tears of affectionate sorrow for his loss. The poor old woman who sells fans at the Capitol in Washington mourned for him, and the negro girls of the city took leaves and blossoms from the floral mementoes on his coffin, to preserve as souvenirs of the noble champion of their race.

THE NEW YORK Tribune fears that "pretty soon all the antiquities of Boston will be in Drake's History." We fear so, too, if the ruthless logic of business continues to despise the sentiment of reverence that would preserve the few vestiges of historic interest which we have remaining. Sentiment is an old-fashioned thing, to be sure; but it has some precious contents—such as love, and hope, and veneration—and the feet of advancing civilization ought to step carefully among these things.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "In noticing the action and indifference of a large class of mankind to anything like improvement or elevation, I have wondered whether it was not better for such to have the old Orthodox belief in future rewards and punishments." But they do have it! "A large class of mankind" still cling to all the old Orthodox beliefs; and yet they are, as our correspondent says, "indifferent to anything like improvement and elevation." It is a mistake to suppose that liberal or radical views would make them more indifferent; on the contrary, those who take these views deep into their minds and hearts become filled with a fine moral enthusiasm of which the old Orthodoxy knows nothing!

THE SADDEST sort of atheism is expressed in the following lines, from The Independent:—

I am naught but the guest of an hour,
I am naught but a wayfaring man,
Hurried on by a pitiless power,
Sowing here, reaping there, as I can.
I have looked, and no hues iridescent
Gleam glad from the Future's dim gates;
Is there more for man, then, than the present—
Is there love with the Fates?

"Hurried on by a pitiless power,"—is that really our condition in this life? Who will believe it, until he is obliged to? Certainly, the best we can conceive is more likely to be true than the worst! Who is ashamed at least to hope that there "is more for man than the present," and that there "is love with the Fates"? Besides, let those believe, who can.

BISHOP CUMMINS and his fellow dissenters from the Episcopal Church held a meeting recently in New York, and adopted a name for their own new church. The bishop wished it to be called "The Church of the Savior." Another man suggested "Christ's Reformed Episcopal Church of New York,"—a name which, to repeat often, would consume too much valuable time. But, strange to relate, the majority showed themselves strikingly sensible by disfavoring, as the report says, "any selection which might lead to naming churches of the new sect after saints." So "Christ" was voted down, and "The First Reformed Episcopal Church of New York" was the name unanimously decided upon,—a name too long, but one unobjectionable on the score of a recognition of the leadership of any saint. We can scarcely believe that this action was taken with a full realization, on the part of these Episcopal dissenters, of all that it signifies; but it certainly suggests that their minds are working in a very broad direction.

Primary Steps in Self-Government.

AN ESSAY READ TO THE SECOND RADICAL CLUB, BOSTON, FEBRUARY 23.

BY LOUISE S. HOTCHKISS.

To know what to govern in one's nature is the first requisite to self-government. Given certain temperature and soil, certain amount of light and space, and we feel confident a tree will attain a stature of six feet, eight, or ten, as the case may be. Feed a horse amply upon oats and hay, blanket him well at night, exercise him moderately, treat him kindly, and we believe all the laws of the animal's body have been obeyed—that if he is unhappy in his mind, or dies young, he is to blame; not we. Everything exterior to man seems to exist in shape possible for analyzing, systematizing, and putting into harmony with natural law. But man himself does not fall into line of comprehension and order so easily. Science has studied the material man diligently and laboriously since his creation. Science studies the material horse a quarter of a year, and gains knowledge sufficient to control all diseases of this quadruped for half a century. Granted that man has a soul and the horse has not, does the action of thought, the sentiment of affection, the attributes of taste, hope, and ambition, so affect the nerves, membrane, and blood of the body that it must needs be subject every year to a new form of disease so complicated that medical skill is baffled, and at its wits' ends to know how to cope with this newly developed monster?

The horse eats three kinds of food, and is never sick. Man partakes of nearly everything that grows out of the ground, lives on the earth, flies in the air, or swims in the sea. Enter any of our large hotels, and, looking over the bill of fare, we find there advertised some unknown animal, or some known animal with an unknown name, that has left its own happy home in the brook or mud-puddle and come hither; or some botanical plant that has ceased to beautify the face of the earth, and is now to stuff the greedy stomach. Behold, some ingenious Yankee has risked his life in the experiment, eaten of the article and lived; got out a patent for it, sold it to the hotel keepers, pocketed twenty thousand dollars, and here we have it,—pâte de lily, frog, or snake. At the progress we are making in the art of eating, it cannot be long before every plant and animal will have its day in the stew-pan; and man himself may be happy if he escapes this gormandizing period. I do not wish to credit the horse with more strength of character than he is worthy of; undoubtedly if he had a tongue he would not be content with his limited bill of fare, but would ask for beefsteak, roast beef, and mutton-chop, with a little wine to savor his cup of cold water. This speechless organ is doubtless his physical salvation. One can speculate that this is the missing link that separates the animal creation from the human—the tongue to speak, the food to eat, and thus onward in the scale of civilization. Men act as though this were their creed: that to become highly human they must eat everything, and eat continually; that Mother Eve's way to get knowledge was to eat for it; that she was in the right, after all, and her example they were bound to follow. When dyspepsia becomes too conspicuous, in sallow faces, sunken eyes, and drooping spirits, there bursts forth an army of dietetic reformers in great gusto; but none of these agree in their modus operandi. Meat is too animal, says one; vegetable diet is too feeble, says another; wine is too stimulating, says a third; wine in moderate quantity is invigorating, says a fourth. So the poor, distracted dyspeptic runs from one prescribed dish to another, groaning louder and longer over every theory he follows, and ends in condemnation of water cures and health journals as severe as ever were lashed upon quack pill boxes and patent medicines. Meantime we keep eating, and experimenting in new dishes, and wishing we enjoyed better health.

I am acquainted with a woman who has thoroughly fitted herself for medical practice—who has been abroad and spent large sums of money to obtain a professional education. She returned and began her work. In less than a year she shut up her office, and threw away her medicines, as she said, totally disgusted with the business of patching up health laws that people were constantly breaking by over-eating and ignorant living. If all the doctors would make such a noble sacrifice of themselves, is it not likely this sick world would soon be well? for who would be so foolish as to run the risk of breaking laws, when there was no one to mend them? Is it not probable there would be as many broken necks as there are now broken arms and legs, were there as sure a method of repairs for the former as the latter?

If not all the sin and crime in the world arises from unlawful eating and drinking, yet so large is the proportion that the remaining causes would be exceedingly few in number. The blood that is fed from unhealthy meat, strong drink, scrofulous pork, half-cooked dough and vegetables, from stomachs overloaded with food, indigestible because of quantity, frequency of eating, and improper hours, goes coursing through the veins, carrying its black and poisonous matter to the brain. Here the vile stimulant is lodged, and sets up its frightful images of murder, theft, and licentiousness. Often result these terrible crimes; quite frequently cross words, the sudden blow, the abuse of all the passions, the blasted home. All the governing faculties are enfeebled; the hand is weak, the will paralyzed, or crazed; the independent man is lost in the sickly material that encompasses him, and he is obliged to depend upon exterior force to control his actions. Bad blood delights most in bad deeds, is the universal law. But what a multitude of words are wasted in moral exhortations, because of the absolute ignorance of this primary principle of well-being.

"Be pure in heart, and love the Lord," entreats the minister from his desk on a beautiful Sunday morning—his audience stupid and half asleep under the influence of baked beans, that have wallowed for twenty-four hours in pots of greasy pork fat. "Live a pure life," says the mother to her son, as she bids him good-by on his way to yonder college, the blood of his system stimulated with richly seasoned meats, highly spiced cake, and strong coffee—food that has been his constant diet from his childhood, prepared by her hand. "Be modest and lady-like,' the same mother says to her young daughter (blood in the same condition), as she goes down town to her private school, there to flirt with the young men across the way, and spend half her time, and all her thoughts, in writing love-notes of questionable contents.

I believe that Nature has spread her table for man with a great abundance and vast variety of food; that the wholesome meats, rich fruits, and even pure wines, are all for him to enjoy, and by which he may be benefitted; and that he has the inalienable right to choose of which he will partake, provided he acquaints himself first with the law that the blood of the body must be pure and healthy; that it must flow in regular currents through the system, that the nerves may be in normal action, and the brain, which is under control of the blood, capable of governing the appetites of the man. Not all the seducing viands of the earth would tempt a man to rub poison into the pores of his hands, even though the process were as agreeable as the tasting of these viands would be to the palate. The effect of the poisonous matter upon the exterior surface would be at once apparent, and the process visible to the naked eye. Let the vast network of interior physical laws and their relation to intellectual and spiritual life be as well understood, and though the land overflow with milk and honey—or rum, gin, and brandy—man will take care that this house he lives in is not poisoned or injured by any of these. Temperance societies and liquor saloons alike will both quickly disappear, for there will be no business for either.

With the greatest respect for the emotional nature of my sisters, I cannot prevent a feeling of deep pity at the tremendous waste of reason they are now making in their attempt to pray intemperance out of existence. Whilst I would pass by their bended forms with the least possible noise, not to interfere with their weak but honest conviction of duty, and perfect right to their method of expressing it, yet I could not refrain from strong regret that they have been so idle and unwilling to learn God's laws of physical living, which study would require some effort of their mental powers; because many of them have been so ignorant in their homes, neglecting to provide suitable food for their husbands and sons, and never learning and discoursing with them upon the true scientific principles of all physical and spiritual progress; because they are so slow with every intellectual effort that strikes at the root of evils, but so ready to do the easier but short-lived thing of screaming and crying as a remedy for all the ills of life.

There can be little hope that the man will become a wise follower of these laws consistent with Nature, unless we can start the little child a self-governing child. If a boy cannot stand erect in a boy-like attitude, he will never stand when a man in a man-like attitude. If he is weak and dependent at one end of the race, he will be pretty sure to be at the other. If the innumerable products of the earth are for man to eat, then the same dishes are before the child for him to grow into eating, as the muscles of the body and strength of the stomach will permit. The child does not begin to be a free agent, of course, till he takes on some degree of mental and physical activity. He is not independent so long as he is entirely dependent. In its utterly helpless state the child has no mental conception of liberty or self-government. Its mother is its life, as much now as before its birth. She feeds it, if a sensible mother, with the thought of giving it a pure, healthy body, that is soon to begin to master itself. She does not trouble herself at this stage so much about the future morals of the child as its material blood. The same when it begins by signs and words to ask for the food it sees prepared for others—when the senses of taste and smell are awakening; she is then mindful of the pure blood to flow through the veins, the basis of truth, honesty, and self-government. The child should come by gradual steps to the table of its parents—its education in eating being graded, as is its intellectual growth. No one would think of dazzling the eyes of a four-year-old boy with all the apparatus of a high-school laboratory, but rather let him alone with his Kindergarten playthings till he is ready for promotion. The nursery table should be a long time spread—spread as artistically as the child's tastes will admit. Around this child-table begin simple lessons in hygiene and physiology, as soon as the perception and reason can see and digest their meaning. Accompanying these lessons should be granted the largest liberty the child is capable of grasping without any permanent injury. I do not think a parent wise in running any extreme risk for the sake of a child's gaining experience.

There is more folly taught than wisdom in all violent lessons with children. There would be no serious risk, however, in allowing Mary two plates of strawberries if she is very urgent in her demands, whilst there would be fine opportunity to reveal to her understanding the logical relation of cause and effect, in case the fruit renders her slightly uncomfortable. I frequently hear parents tell their children it is not right to eat this or that, or it is wrong to eat so much. It seems a pity to slay these words at the outset, by rendering them so utterly meaningless to the child, when they might be of so much service, later, in guiding his moral nature.

Rather than such waste of ethics, produce the real organs of digestion, if such can be obtained, or the best plates, and explain the process as it is carried on. The child would quickly see it is not wrong for a brook to run up hill—but it can't, so it won't. He will as plainly perceive that the organs cannot digest improper food, for it is not the law. At the age of eight or ten, he might be admitted to the older table of his parents, and allowed much wider freedom than he has had before. More advanced lessons in the study of physical laws can now be taken up. The food the older ones eat can be analyzed before the child's eyes, and he encouraged to take part in the search for the elements it contains, and decide which will make good blood and which bad.

This material education should not be limited to the home, but carried to the schoolroom, for here it is that good blood is often turned into bad, by the foul air that is generated among crowds of children. I can assert from experience that quite young children can be trusted with nearly the whole management of schoolroom ventilation; that they will open and close ventilators, avoid draughts of air, and judge of the state of the atmosphere in the room, with remarkable fineness of perception and accuracy. Preparatory lessons in physiology, experimenting among different currents of air, pure and impure, studying causes and effects, must of course precede.

In connection with instruction in eating and breathing comes that of bathing, as equally valuable to keep pure the blood. There are no lessons so intensely interesting to children as those that teach the parts, structure, and uses of their own bodies. I shall never forget the looks of wonder and amazement that covered one schoolroom of faces, as I unfolded the fact that the pores of the body breathe. Up went sleeves, and out came handkerchiefs, to rub clean a spot, to catch sight of these before unheard-of orifices. Whilst the iron was hot I did not fail to press home the importance of cleanliness in promoting circulation of blood and vitality through the system. If the subject was never presented again, I felt sure the seed sown would not all fall by the wayside.

After the child has some control of his appetite, values his body sufficiently to guard it from harm, keep it clean, give it fresh air to breathe, light and sunshine—after he understands how exterior agents may injure, break, or disarrange the members or organs of the body, and the pain or loss of life resulting therefrom,—then is the period in his mental growth when he can be taught intelligently and with sympathy to treat kindly dumb animals and the bodies of his human companions around him; and this step onward will be as natural as putting one foot above the other in going up stairs.

The little girl that stood by the window, and, placing one chubby finger on the fly, said, "Ittle fy, ittle fy, want to do and see your Dod? do, then"—had no conception there was any pain connected with the transit of the fly. There are boys who torment cats as innocently as they fly their kites; and men who whip their horses quite as ignorantly. The cats are only playthings for the boys—the horses machines for the men. They have never heard the animals say, "Don't whip me, don't pelt me with stones;" and how do they know it hurts? how do they know that flesh in cat and horse suffers just the same as flesh in boy and man? "They have been told," you will say; yes, but never taught.

Telling generally no more than hits the surface, while teaching, if it be of the right sort, works from the centre through the entire being. I have seen as rough a class of fifty-six boys as can be produced in this city—boys accustomed to practise every sort of cruelty upon animals dumb and human, such as stringing flies on pins, stoning cats and dogs, pounding a lame old horse out of sight, travelling an entire afternoon to rob one bird's nest, whilst fighting each other was a most delightful pastime—become kind to animals, even quite sensitive concerning their rights. They carried their sympathy so far that they complained to the city agents of cruelty they saw practised, and went about in groups informing older individuals how their horses should be fed and driven; at the same time fighting among themselves, except in great rage, entirely ceased. The teacher could not control this passion wholly, because of the primary steps in their own physical education that had been neglected.

The first lesson imparted to this class in this department of self-government did not consist in telling the boys it was wicked to torture flies and torment cats. In fact, nothing was said about the right or wrong of the matter. They were simply asked to pull off their own fingers and string them on pins. Nearly all tried; a few seemed afraid and did not attempt it. When asked why they stopped, they said, "It hurts." Undoubtedly they had been told many times in their lives it hurt flies to pull off their legs, but the questioning eyes and silent faces assured the teacher it was the first time they ever felt it. In the same class, a boy was injured one day by an intentional blow from one of his classmates. Bleeding and groaning he was brought in before the school. The teacher asked the offender to aid her as she bathed the wounded face and bound it up. Meantime, she explained to the culprit and as many of the class as gathered around to witness the operation how the skin was broken, the flesh bruised, the delicate nerves crushed—the cause of the pain the boy was suffering. Then she asked different boys to describe the distress, as they recalled experience of this sort which some of them had passed through on previous occasions. As my mind reverts now to the scene, it was quite solemn and impressive. I think there was greater respect for flesh and bones in that class ever afterwards. I think such methods of instruction continued in life would render it a less trifling thing for men to shatter the limbs and bodies of their fellows in battles.

When the child has added to the care he has for his own body the same intelligent respect and feeling for all other living bodies around him, he is capable of advancing in the study of his intellectual and spiritual nature, or those higher qualities which go to make up the joy and beauty of human life. His cheek is rosy, his eye bright and clear, his body is purity and truth. Every pulsation vibrates with the will of his Creator.

It is natural and comparatively easy now to assimilate the soul faculties to the same grand order. The hand that would not hurt the dumb animal, through fear of causing it pain, or abuse its own body, will be mindful of the higher law of sentiment and feeling.

Respect for all the rights of humanity will be generated through this material education. The affections will unfold spontaneously, and the expression of the affections will be easy and full, if the naturalness of the child be not interfered with by false teaching. I have been pleading that the child may have an individual self-governing body. I now plead for its accompaniment—an individual character; believing the free development of individuality, as one of the leading essentials of well-being, is the only true method by which man may possess the elements of self-government.

The first principle of all true education is to unfold the character from within—not patch over the outside, or stuff the inside with our own ideas. Let all the impulses with which the nature is charged find expression; most if not all of them can be turned to some account. A very few may have to be rooted out; if so, then all the more necessary that they come to the surface. Almost the first indication of individuality the child shows is will. A little soft bundle in its mother's lap, it grows red in the face, kicks and beats the air with its tiny fists; and we say, "It has a bit of the old Adam in it."

This self-will is generally considered by friends as a very great offence—something that must be killed at once—that all the good of which humanity is capable is comprised in obedience. A fatal mistake is made at the outset in not comprehending this element of individuality. A grand war begins—the parents' will anti the child's will. The boy has a perfect right to his will, and he knows it. He comes as honestly by it as he does by the hair on the top of his head. He feels it, and likes to exercise his little will as well as his papa does his bigger will. The parent says "no" to society many times when society would like him to say "yes"—but no moral obligation is involved. So he says "no," simply because he wills it. Society does not thrash him into yielding. The parent is not as consistent with the child. The latter gets a whipping if it refuses to bring the book or pick up the scissors, though it sees no moral obligation involved; is only exercising its will as innocently as it would exercise any other faculty. The parent glories when the victory is gained; so much will is crushed. Yes, oh parent! and so much individuality is crushed. Ten or fifteen years of such pressure, and the lad goes out into the world to fall a victim to the first bad will it meets that is stronger than its own enfeebled one. Or a worse consequence is a passive and hypocritical obedience so long as the threatened authority is in power, but out of its reach a lawless abuse of this will, regardless of the suffering it may inflict on others, or shame it may bring upon itself.

To train this faculty and develop it for a noble service by allowing it to live and grow seems a very laborious task—almost an impossible end to reach. The teacher will tell you that half the children in school would stay away, if they were allowed their own will, and the mother will confirm the teacher's statement, and add that her own children would not see the schoolroom one day in seven.

Although our schools are such crowded places, although they cramp and fetter the child's liberty so terribly—the little feet being forbidden to move when they throb and ache for a kick,—still I do not think a child well trained in physical obedience, sympathetic towards his companions, would often forsake his school, though he never heard the words, "You must go," or saw threats of authority. A few offences might happen; but abundant time and patience on the part of his parents and teachers, with reasonable confidence in human nature, and the offender could be shown the laws he had violated in his intellectual growth, and the break in the school work and injustice to others that had been caused by his absence.

I have known boys entirely cured of truancy by taking no notice of their absence for several days. One boy ran away to sea and staid three years, then returned of his own pleasure, and pleaded to be taken into school again. He applied himself laboriously to his books, and learned more in one year than he would in all the three had he been forced to stay against his will. Children like occasionally to run out alone, with their great teacher, Nature. I think they should be trusted. Half the individuality in children is suppressed by false notions about noise and order. I don't know but there are too many children in the world for the grown-up people to endure—too many pairs of little feet for the nerves of older folks. If this be true, the children are not responsible, and must not yield their freedom on that account. The nerves must learn some way to endure the racket. Undoubtedly it would be more agreeable to a mother to have her parlor still when she is conversing with callers—to have her six noisy boys sit down in a row, heads erect, feet crossed on the carpet, and hands folded in their laps. But natural, developing boys will not be able long to be so accommodating. Love for their mother and conformity to certain rules of society she has taught them will restrain them somewhat; but vigorous blood and individuality will assert their right to move and speak, and the order and quiet will be interfered with.

There is too much repression in schoolrooms—not too much natural order, but too much enforced stillness. Many educators gauge the merits of a pedagogue by the stillness of his room—consider it a great virtue if the clock can be heard to tick, though the little ones hold their breaths to secure this silence. These motionless rooms must of necessity be run in a very mechanical manner, and individuality would have a poor chance.

Indeed, it would be impossible in a room of fifty-six scholars to pay much respect to personality, however highly the teacher might prize it. The confusion would be unbearable, whilst the peculiarities of character represented in such a mass could receive little or no attention to aid in their culture. When the world has faith in the star that points to a future generation of self-governing men and women, it will see the economy of using money to help the child up into the man that can take care of himself, rather than spend ten times as much in support of policemen, jails, and lock-ups to take this care when the ignorant mind has made its way into a grown-up body.

Children should be encouraged to give their opinions on all subjects which naturally come within range of their perception and comprehension. It leads the mind to the discovery of new truths, and exposes the evils of life in their most glaring light. If the child has done wrong by violating some law, do not accuse him of his error till the subject has been discussed and his opinion been gained. If he does not see the fault, he should not be told it is a fault. Leave it till another opportunity when more evidence can be brought to light. Meaningless words always dull the conscience.

It requires steady, strong nerves, a large amount of brains, and a heart of unbounded sympathy, to hear and answer all the debates these youthful subjects have to hold; but is it not worth all the trouble it costs in the enlightened conscience that is awakened which never will slumber again—which will appear in manhood to reflect upon the great questions of life—which will be ready to search for the way to truth and right—which will grant others their rights and opinions, and will encourage the continual reaching after new ideas and progress?

To what a millennium day such growth would lead us, what sweet harmony among the social spheres, when all men's opinions of whatever shade shall be keyed to accord; when the base, the alto, and soprano shall each repeat its own part and in turn be respected by all listeners,—when it shall cause a man more sincere delight to hear expressed the honest conviction of his friend, however much unlike his own, than the best imitation he could possibly present!

I believe God's ear has been listening patiently these ages for all the individual ideas of men and women to find a key-board on which they shall blend as perfectly as the finest strains of music. In seeking to cultivate the tastes of the young, it is a mistake to set up patterns for them to follow. The mother that says to her little daughter, "Why don't you try to behave like little Lucy Jones?"—walk like her, bow like her, or speak like her—steals away her daughter's individuality and helps her into some mould not her own.

There is a way to emulate well-doing by pointing out the degree of excellence another has reached in his house; but never encourage a child to build like it, in shape, size, or color. Sabbath-school books have done not a small share of the mischief of making copyists by parading their "good children that die young" before the tender and imaginative mind. But we can be thankful such children have nearly all disappeared from the face of the earth, and real ones are filling up their places.

The individuality of the young should be allowed entire freedom to express itself in choice of games, and plays, and all sports, as far as it does not infringe upon the rights of others. I believe two-thirds of all the immorality between the sexes in the grown-up world can be charged directly upon parents and friends, who introduce into their children's plays the heathenish practice of sensual kissing, combined with the low sentiments they hold concerning the relations of the sexes. I do not mean to condemn the sweet, pure kiss of friendship and true affection, which naturally expresses the spiritual love that brothers and sisters and near friends have for each other. But witness the kissing games that baby boys and girls engage in at their infant parties—the older ones looking on, conducting the exercise with eager, lustful eyes, speaking as plainly as words can utter, that the show is purely of their invention, and carried on to give expression to their own vile and ignorant habits; then the talk that follows, bantering the boys and girls about their preferences, is equally unnatural and demoralizing.

No company of real children ever selected such base sentiment as this, in which to give vent to their youthful love of fun and frolic. Instead, they will try their strength in sliding down hill, gymnastic exercises, jumping rope, and playing games of all sorts, for trial of skill, rivalry, and invention; interpolated here and there with a brisk dispute of opinions. This natural course of their own leads them to an acquaintance that unfolds the character of each, step by step, to true and high relations.

The child's intellect has been advancing every hour from the first moment he learned he had a mouth, and how to feed it. The true system of education will go on unfolding all the germs within, feeding all the eager faculties by bringing knowledge within their reach, and training them to serve the highest ideal of life.

In the two great departments of well-being we have been considering—physical health and individuality—the masculine portion of humanity has had a more perfect training thus far than has fallen to the lot of woman. Though the food has been much the same for both, man has gained vigor and health by exercise and freedom of clothing, of which blessings woman has been deprived; whilst individuality in the education of woman has always been looked upon as a disgrace for her to possess. The neglect of these two branches, so indispensable to self-government, has resulted in making dwarfs of half the human family, with little more conception of self-keeping than half-grown children.

Womanhood is generally considered a very simple quantity, composed of one function—motherhood,—and a species of piety that has employed itself in praying that the men might become a little more angelic in their behavior, and the children enter heaven; all to be accomplished by some miraculous intervention of Providence, independent of any intelligent exertion on their part. The pale, Madonna-like face of woman, her frequent prayers and tears, have also conceded to her the balance of virtue. Nothing further would probably ever have been known concerning woman's faculties, had not a few women by chance come nearer to Nature in their development, and standing on tip-toe peeped over the wall ignorance had built around the truth. These monstrosities, as they have been called, but to whom we will apply the rightful term real women, were amazed at the slave-like attitude of their sisters, when the truth burst upon their vision. The chains were monstrous—they ground their hard links into their flesh, even to the very heart-strings. The only thought was of breaking them, and the ballot-box was seized as the mightiest sledge-hammer with which to smash them asunder. It was believed this would floor the mighty tyrant, whoever he might be, and all women would spring to their feet. But suffrage-reformers can answer from experience how slow woman has been to accept the terms. She was not able to walk, and man told her she was not made to walk. She did not wish to go, and he did not wish to have her. It was six of one and half a dozen of the other. The tyrant was discovered to be ignorance no more of the masculine gender than the feminine.

So the trumpet call of suffrage sounded its alarm through the land, and was of untold value, but chiefly as a school-bell rings to summon the children to their a b c's. A good deal of experimenting was, however, indulged in, before it became evident that woman's emancipation could only be secured through her physical perfection, and the slow evolution of her individuality. In working out a programme of study it is not at all surprising that the curriculum presented at first should have been much like that man has always followed. For though man's sphere was not very enticing, it was better than woman's slavish, cramped condition—there was room to breathe in it, at least. So the first effort was to see how man's school of life would answer for woman to grow in. It would be a mighty work, indeed, for one generation of people to cipher out this problem; to follow through the mysterious structure of such an unknown element as woman, and lay a plan that would be harmonious with the laws of her being. No difficult sum in mathematics is ever completed without numerous mistakes being made, numbers erased, and their places supplied with others. There has been a good deal of rubbing out and substituting in this woman problem, and there will probably be much more; but every stroke brings us nearer and nearer its solution.

To be consistent with this plan of evolution for the self-government and well-being of the soul and physical natures of humanity, I do not see how it is possible to treat the two unlike natures of the sexes the same in the entire course of their education. Evolution, as we know, is the process of unrolling the bud, or unfolding the germ—whether it be of the will, or heart, or sex. Culture goes on to perfect it. There would be no logic in neglecting one germ more than another; there could be no harmony in the sum total of a nature if any of the germs were contemned.

I have endeavored to show that no system of education is perfect that does not appeal to the child's reason to aid in the work as soon as that faculty is capable of exercise. Food is analyzed to learn its elements, whether they will make good blood or bad; bathing, air, and sunshine are enjoyed to secure the health of the body and happiness of the heart. The little will is improved, that it may make a self-restraining will when it is grown up; the opinions are allowed expression, that they may always be searching after the treasures of truth. The child is led so slowly and carefully along, he sees clearly the chain of law his being is grasping. To continue this line of law, the girl's physical instruction must consider sex in its methods. Neither are her mother and teachers to stand outside and order her to various exercises their wisdom approves, but she is to be the party most interested, and conscious of her physical development. Then it follows that the girl with physical structure differing from that of boys, but which is to receive full attention, the methods of education will necessarily diverge, whether they be carried on in separate buildings or under the same roof. I should say under the same roof, by all means, if a new track can be laid through our boys' schools and colleges; one track leading to manhood, the other to womanhood.

But farther than the physical perfection of the girl arising from this entire education is the corresponding soul sympathy which will be awakened, and which I claim is the basis of her individuality—the inspiration of her moral and intellectual nature. The education of the will, the opinions and tastes of the boy and girl should be similar, till this epoch of conscious womanhood is reached. After that every impulse of her soul is feminine; every element of her intellect is feminine; every stroke of her handiwork is feminine. The only helping hand that can now serve her is the one that leads her intellect, her heart, and her sex to the best gifts the earth affords for the ripening of these faculties. If she is so fortunate as to enter this true way, her entire existence will be under law, and she evolving from her nature her own individuality—"a true woman."

This true woman will not be the slave of man, but his peer. A self-governing womanhood will command respect and love; and more than this, will hold control over the actions of man always equal to that which a self-governing manhood extends over woman. If a woman can only master herself by developing her own soul and physical individuality, though she becomes a thousand times more perfect willow, and not one iota like the oak that grows by her side, she will always enjoy a range of freedom as broad as his, and influence equal to his; for where the true man is found, there must be found the true woman also.

Dr. Clarke's book, Sex in Education, I can but think a scientific work of untold aid to this cause; coming at a most opportune moment, to second dress reformers and all others wisely engaged in woman's physical education. Perhaps it has staggered a few, who thought the perfect woman was going to resemble in some sort of way the perfect man, and a few more who longed so sincerely to rescue woman instantly from her ignorance and servitude. These last will wait impatiently for this slow process of revolution. I recollect hearing a woman of much culture say, just after she left the Woman's Congress in New York: "I never was proud in my life before that I was a woman—man has been my ideal. I am perfectly content now to wait and let her become the best thing she can be."

The more we see to admire in the female structure of mind and body—the power and beauty of which is rapidly appearing as the marble is chiselled—the more anxious we are that the result shall be a new creation, an individual quite unlike man,—something as great and grand in her womanly way as he is in his manliness.

We hear a great deal of scolding from both male and female reformers because women do not accomplish better work. Some of this criticism is undoubtedly deserved, for there are slack women as there are slack men. But there is danger of woman's individuality being ignored by this excessive remonstrance. To fulfil the personality of sex, and at the same time perfect herself, man-like, in all the head-craft and hand-craft of the world, requires woman to be a two-fold being. To neglect the individuality of sex, and give all the being to compete in accuracy with the best work man's undivided attention may accomplish, would result in finely-equipped masculine intellects minus the real woman. There are hundreds of women in possession of such property which they have acquired by copying man's methods, rather than striving to develop the germs of their own being. But such women are not self-governed—they are the most impatient, demanding, one-sided, selfish women society has to deal with. Another class of women are committing slow but certain suicide, in striving to reach their high ideal of the true woman, and at the same time equal or excel the efforts of man. They are told, and they believe, that to emerge from their state of ignorant helplessness they must go to college and take a diploma of first degree—not an imperfect lesson, not a day's absence from school; that if they go into business they must stand on their feet as men (don't), twelve hours a day for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year; that if they serve on juries they must forsake their children and not sleep a wink for several months, till the case is decided; that if they serve on school committees they must stay till midnight, and then go home alone, as the men do; that if they vote, they must stand up in horse-cars; that if they teach school, and ask for equal salaries with men, they must never get married, but always teach; and if they can't do all this, they may sit and eat of the crumbs that fall from their masters' tables, and say no more about their rights.

The women that believe this nonsense, and are seeking to prove to the world that they are of the same mental and muscular fibre as men, or that one woman is equal to a woman plus a man, will have all their pains for no other returns than a broken-down constitution, and the encouraging words at last: "Women can't do anything, after all." Nothing is more illogical, contrary to nature, sense, or reason, than any argument for or against woman's capacity or sphere that is based upon any comparison of the brains or muscles of the two sexes, or the likeness or unlikeness of work. Womanhood is a good thing, and a necessary thing to have everywhere. In its ignorance it has blessed the world, and in its future intelligence it will bless it more fully. It is a good thing, whether it can stand as long as a man can, or is obliged to sit down part of the time; whether it stays on the juries all night, or only till ten o'clock, and then goes home to its babies; whether it goes to college and gets diploma number one or number fifty; whether it teaches twenty-five years or only five, and then gets married; whether it votes standing or sitting; whether it goes to school committee meetings and stays till one o'clock at night, or goes home at nine.

Woman's work is of great value, whether it is done as well as man's, or not half as well as his. It is inspiration to his slower and perhaps more persistent chiselling. Who shall say that inspiration is not worth as many dollars as the mechanical blows of the pickaxe? It is of great value in the store, in the office, in all the professions, whether it spells all its words correctly, or misses a few; whether it writes all its sentences in a logical fashion, or half of them in an illogical fashion. John Stuart Mill's wife could not probably read a word of Greek at three years of age, or at five, or twenty-five—perhaps never in all her life. It is not likely her mind ever toiled one-hundredth part as much over books as did her husband. Yet, according to his own statement, her intellect was worth as much as his in all the literary work they ever accomplished. And we know his great brain would have been a poorly-balanced thing, had it not been for the large soul-brained woman that came to give it shape.

Let woman be brave and persistent in the evolution of her own individuality, be it body, sex, soul, or intellect, and she will become a self-governing agent. Man will yield her place wherever her nature commands her to go; and no one will say intelligent womanhood is a cheap and inferior commodity, though it be the most unlike manhood of anything that has ever made its appearance on the face of the earth.

The more an individual, be it man or woman, comes to respect and obey Nature's laws, the less regard he will have for external force. When he has learned to know the voice of the great teacher, he will not willingly sit at the feet of corrupt politicians and wicked law-givers. When he has learned from God's handwriting what is good for him to do, and what is not, he will receive very impatiently the ignorant orderings of statute books concerning his well-doing.

When he has learned to respect all the rights of humanity through first learning to respect his own, he will not reverence any method that society can invent which interferes with his own method of serving his neighbor. Finally, he will be burdened beyond endurance with any network of red tape which man shall seek to throw over or around him.

The agitation for religious liberty that is pressing its way through the land, the emancipation of woman which is becoming the great thought of the age, and, more than all, the effort that is being made to secure a system of education which shall aim at physical culture and the evolution of individuality for the child, are surely the torches yet to light a ponderous pile of State houses, jails, police courts, vast national law-capitols, and law and statute books. The welfare of thousands of children will not wait and cater to a supreme court, pleading that three good and wise women may serve them on a school board. The Supreme Court will be burned up in the general conflagration, and a supreme humanity will serve in its stead.

Temperance laws will not trouble hotel-keepers or craze the women; for no man who has learned the law of eating and drinking will abuse the wine that is pressed from the grape, though the article flow as freely as water through our streets. The marriage institution will not be forging iron bands to fasten man and woman together, when the perfected individuality of one sex seeks to complete itself in the perfected individuality of the other. Freedom and liberty are words we have heard from our childhood—they have made sweet phrases in which to sing and pray; they are to have a deeper meaning—the self-government of humanity.

A NICE DISTINCTION.—When Thurlow was chancellor, it happened that a benefice fell vacant which the Archbishop of Canterbury claimed that he had a right to fill, while others claimed that it belonged to the keeper of the great seal for the time-being; and the archbishop was simple enough to send a gentleman to Lord Thurlow to propose that he, the prelate, should present a candidate for the existing vacancy, and the chancellor should do the like for the next vacancy that should occur in the place. Thurlow heard the proposal with undisguised astonishment, and shouted, "Tell the archbishop I'll see him d——d first." "Is that exactly the message," said the gentleman, "that you wish me to take from the Lord Chancellor of England to the Primate of the Church?" "No," said Thurlow, "certainly not; I am very much obliged to you. Tell the archbishop I will be d——d first."

COMING ACROSS the Atlantic lately, an English clergyman of the Established Church found it agreeable to himself to thorn a patriotic Yankee sitting at the steamer's dinner table with some remarks upon the late Fisk, Jr., as a specimen product of our institutions. At last he said: "Why, was he not a distinguished person in your society, and did he not hold an important office under your Government?" "Oh, no," said the American, "he was an Episcopal minister."

"CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PITTSBURGH COMMERCIAL:

We propose to notice, as succinctly as possible, the character of the movement whose object is indicated by the caption of this article. The seventh annual address of the associated wisdom of this movement has been made to a gainsaying world. This address, once on its mission, whatever it may accomplish or fail to accomplish, it will not lack the distinctiveness of a forensic, whose most sapient inspiration was the circumstance of a great occasion. More than 1,000 delegates—to be exact, 1,037—met in Library Hall to air a neophyte as yet quite novel to the American mind. These delegates represented eighteen States of our unholy Union. Yet, indicative of their economy and sound financial policy, in these godless times of expensive modes of transit, nine-tenths of the delegates were our neighbors and neighbors' children. True at once to their policy and object, the contiguous auxiliary societies delegated as a general thing their masculine forces, to swell the occasion and give the power of figures to their report.

To some of the delegates, at least, the convention was the event of their lives. Never did the voice of wisdom ring clearer in eloquent discussions of law. Never did scientific representations of government come so near human comprehension. Never, in sage's vision or poet's dream, did the final glory of life's trust and work seem so near as in the unctuous prophecies of the hour. Every speech, theory, and promise was gulped with the greed and confidence of unfledged birdlings. No one stopped to consider the ingredients of the hash. Predetermined to relish it, of course they did, and with many demonstrations of joy, notwithstanding it savored of > "Eye of newt, and toe of frog,

> Wool of bat, and tongue of dog"—
> Purp of black, and purp of tan,
> Will of God, and way of man.

Theories as thin as the milk of a stingy cow, and logic as bewildering as the prophecies of Daniel, so impressed the convention with the idea of its ethereal gravity and celestial mission as to suggest the necessity of an improved patent of "Darius Green's flying machine." Perched upon a crazy conceit, the only conscious need was wings. If the prayer of the Goddess of Liberty had been answered, they would have had them, and flown on a returnless voyage to the roost of ages.

But as the event of this meeting passes into history, we feel a humane relief. Library Hall is no longer choked with that prodigious name, "The Religious National Constitution Amendment Association." Thomas Nast has made it laugh off the spasm, in its irreligious glee over subjects of his caricature, that need religious amendment far more than the Constitution of our government. The numerous delegates have gone out on the street cars and accommodation trains, pledged to zeal, as by the old Zythian Covenant, to wander in by, if not forbidden, paths, and be forgotten while they brew the buncombe for another annual blunderbuss.

All that is now sought is to improve the occasion. The fluctuations of feeling that measure the public interest indicate the possibility of some attention. Of this we are happy to avail ourselves, in order to pay our respects to this movement by a consideration of its pretensions.

We express what we believe will be the ultimate judgment of the people concerning this movement, when we charge that it is a play of political thimble-riggers disguised in the garb of religious cant. Like orator Puff, it has two voices—one a voice for high debate, and one a whisper for secret conclave. The first is heard in the speeches of the Pittsburgh convention, and the other in the caucuses of a religious society, savoring of signs, passwords, grips, and signals. The ostensible object of the movement is set forth in the speeches of the convention; but the real object, for prudential reasons unstated, is clearly traced in the testimony of a peculiar class of religionists, whose presence here is the result of defeat abroad. It is strictly the movement of mendicant Orthodoxy, with a complement of property-men, scene-shifters, and so forth, and "whosoever is deceived thereby." Ostensibly, the movement proposes such a change in the fundamental law of the land as will supply a recognition of God's sovereign authority, of Christ as the Ruler of nations, and of the Bible as the source of all law.

This is all that is asked or prayed for. The reasons publicly urged in support of this proposed change are: That the Dutch, Irish, Chinese, and so forth, in coming to this country, may have proper religious sensations and emotions, by reference to the conspicuous constitutional tag that shall index our Christian proclivities. And again, that certain other characters, who ought to go back on frogs dietetically, if they have any reverence for their hypothecated ancestors, may be awed into a recognition of "Him in whom we live and move and have our being," or despair of the pelf of the pettiest civil office. Furthermore, it is urged as a consideration of great importance, that a nation may be born in a day. Now, what all this means is not clear. But if the last named event, in the implied sense of this movement, were to take place to-day, with a thousand grog-shops in the city of Pittsburgh all sanctioned by law, to sensible people it would appear much like a national miscarriage, in the hands of these hasty doctors, a nameless abortion procured by priestcraft.

But whatever may be the specious logic of this movement, and whatever its influence with the people, its true character and object can only be known by reference to the history and political dogmas of a people who are "bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh," among themselves. Their history is simply an exposition of their political doctrine, and the record of varied and fruitless attempts to vindicate its truth, and carry its measures in the State. The authorized and sanctioned history of this movement may be purchased at the bookstores in Pittsburgh. The doctrine, as contained in this book, may be stated as follows:—

1. No man has a right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience.

2. No body of men should recognize or confer this right.

3. The Church—the peculiar kingdom of the Divine Redeemer—is distinct from civil government, above and independent of the civil magistrates.

4. The unalterable form of church government is ——.

5. Civil government, although distinct from the Church, is lawfully required by the Church to tolerate its ecclesiastical organization, and support it in the enjoyment of its established rights.

6. Magistrates are lawfully required by the Church to bow at the feet of the Divine Redeemer and nurse the Church.

This doctrine, born of religious intolerance and bigotry, and in this country breathing rank political heresy and treason against our government, is the logic of the movement of these tinkers of constitutional theology. As early as 1640 this doctrine agitated the States of Europe. It was dominant in years of ceaseless strife among the Papists, Prelates, and Presbyters of Briton. From 1640 to 1688, the question among these lords over God's heritage was—Who shall own the king and run the State? The answer to this question in the "Revolution settlement" is stained with the blood of many who were ever learning, and never able to come to the truth. These pious politicians, disowning the settlement of 1688, were effectually excluded from the councils of the State.

Thus being deprived of the alimentary sustenance of State pap, and without the fabled fortune of Romulus and Remus, they fed on meats offered to idols, and managed to keep themselves alive. Cherishing Quixotic dreams of royalty, they left the scenes of their defeat among the hills of Scotland, to go in and out and find pasture in this land of freedom. Not satisfied with the precious boon of liberty guaranteed to them in this country, they erected their judicature in 1744 for the purpose, they tell us, of carrying out, in this nation, the principles of the reformation policy. Reasserting their political doctrine and faith, they joined themselves anew in a most solemn league and covenant, for the overthrow of our system of government, and the erection of a religious oligarch. And this is what constitutional amendment means.

For an hundred years this movement has charged that we are a Godless and Christless nation; that we are not ordained of God, but of the devil; that because the Church, unheeded by the State, is allowed to rise or fall by its own exertions, the State is obnoxious to God, and will be destroyed; and that to compass their ends, or our ruin, they have solemnly pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. Thus, long have they shadowed us at every step of our progress, only waiting for a chance to shoot the American Eagle, and gag the Goddess of Liberty. Thus, long, with insane theories of government, and avowed principles of exclusiveness, have they been trying to muster a power sufficient to change our beautiful civil structure, monumental of the deed of our fathers, and cemented with the blood of our brothers, into a kind of religious smut machine, to be run by the Christian Church of this country, with a convenient automatic attachment for psalm-singing in the halls of our national Congress. Some have been influenced to join this movement, and others have been impressed to serve it. A convention of one thousand men supplies inspiration for the announcement that the movement is on the eve of success, and to-morrow, when the petitions shall have been baled and carted to the Capitol of the nation, the national Congress, with the discretion of Davy Crockett's coon, will come down, and, the work done, the year of jubilee will begin.

But not yet. The masses of the American people are not to be gulled, simply because some among them are born to that end. Let it be known that the measure of the demand is the doctrine on which it is based, and the people will have done with it. Say that this contemplated step is gained; then appropriate legislation must necessarily follow, defining and enforcing the doctrine of the Church in this country: when the fate of the movement is sealed. Let it be known to the people that this movement proposes the erection of an aristocracy of Christian believers, to be supported in their unavoidable intolerance by the State, and unto this end it means ceaseless sectarian strife—in a word, that everything embraced in the doctrine is implied in the present demand,—and it will go without ceremony into limbus fatuorum; the receptacle of all vanity and nonsense. For, somehow, the people of this nation believe that the inborn bent and mind of this Government, its genus loci, is Christian. The history that reveals its origin, rise, and progress, reckons in it a providence that makes it an ordinance of heaven, if any nation ever was. Founded on principles of virtue, contemplating the general weal, seeking impartial justice, securing equal rights to all men, it stands a monument of the unselfish devotion of its founders to humanity. On the world side, what is Christianity but unselfish devotion to humanity? Never was Christianity truer to itself or its mission than when, in the erection of this Government, it mantled it with the glory of its own divine philanthropy, and invited the oppressed of all lands to its sheltering arms. Illustrative of grand faith in the prowess of Christianity was that declaration of man's right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. It made this to be the one fair war-field of the world's contending religions, where Christianity, seeking no advantage it did not accord to others, entered to vindicate its power and achieve its triumphs.

And well has it wrought in the largeness of its faith. Our nation, ordained of God amid the thunder and tumult of revolution, bearing the impress of his spirit in the principles of its peculiar institutions, and representing, as far as States can, the true idea of Christianity, is to-day the hope of many nations, and the land of promise to many weary with the oppression of years. To keep it so we are warned by the speaking blood of our martial dead.

Then, if the Government does not need this proposed change to save it from ungodliness, much less does the Church need it to accomplish its mission. If it cannot succeed without the support of the Government, it certainly cannot with it, and ought not to. Make civil power necessary to the success of the Church in controlling the consciences of men, and your logic proves that Christianity and our boasted American freedom are incompatible. If this movement is right, then our patriotic and Christian sentiments are at war. Then the country or the Church must go down the cliff. But we fear not. Preserving civil liberty and minding our religious business, large success is in the near future. Should the demand of this movement ever become a moral necessity, one of two things will be true: either that Christianity is not what we believe it to be, and incompatible with religious liberty, or that the Christian Church will be filled with faithless cowards who are represented in the movement that now seeks to organize a civil and military crusade against infidelity and Catholicism, and to bring "whosoever loveth and maketh a lie" to judgment, under the habeas corpus of the Church.

But we do not mean to be deceived. Christianity, the religion of a person, whose Author is worshipped, not "in this mountain, nor yet in Jerusalem," but in "spirit and in truth;" whose kingdom is not of this world, national; but of Christ, universal,—denies itself, and is shorn of its power, when it seeks to describe the methods of the Holy Ghost by parliamentary rules or usages. Furthermore, we dwell in peace. And with our American ideas of Church and State commending themselves to us in our unparalleled prosperity, we look into the future, and our faith fails not. Those of every class who object to these ideas can go, or stay together. Voluntary colonization on the part of those who make the motion to amend might be a happy expedient. We would favor it, but for one man who, aside from this movement, is a man after our own heart. In some fair island of the sea—say Ascension Island, for the sake of the name—if it is large enough, they might build their church, and make their civil institution to supply the place of a wet-nurse. To guard against the uncircumcised, and the unclean, and to insure their everlasting peace, they might announce that all infidels will be excluded, that Jews will be fed on ham-sandwiches, that the Dutch cannot be kept over Sunday, and that "no Irish need apply."

But whatever is for the best, while they stay here, this is for the best: Let them heed the sentiment of that grandest challenge ever made by infidelity to the Christian Church, and uttered by Mr. Abbot in the Cincinnati Convention two years ago, when he said: "Gentlemen, brothers: rise above the temptation to seek the triumph of your creed in political strife, and trust your cause, as I trust mine, to the power of truth over the human soul." A. H. Norcross.

Friday, June 8, 1821.—I found him at six o'clock in the evening all alone, and fell into a sharp and unpleasant controversy, which began from my reading aloud, and commending to his notice, some passages in Roth's sketch at Münich of the deceased Senator Merkel of Nürnberg. In mentioning Merkel's heterodox friend Cnopf, the author had brought revealed and natural religion into sharp opposition, which was extremely displeasing to Goethe. "Here one sees a rascal who does not honestly appear under the real color," exclaimed he; "these are the cursed rhetorical tricks which cloak everything over, and want to glide smoothly over everything without speaking out the right and the true. Why, what has made the Christian religion victorious over all others? By what means has it become, and become deservedly, the mistress of the world, except through taking up into itself the truths of natural religion? Where, then, is the opposition? The dividing lines are no longer discernible." Now he proceeded to analyze Roth's whole phraseology, severely reproving its insincerity and unfairness, so that I deeply repented having brought this passage to his notice. It was not my intention to do so; but I could not easily light upon anything more striking.—The Radical for April, 1871: Goethe's correspondence with Chancellor von Müller.

A Methodist conference was sitting in the neighborhood of New York. One of the members took occasion to denounce the growing custom of reading sermons. While other denominations were extemporizing, the Methodists seemed to be taking up the cast-off habit of reading. The answer was: "Before you censure young men, you had better call the doctors of divinity to account, who are reading every word of their sermons before the Conference." A voice cried out: "You had better censure those ministers who come before the Conference with other men's sermons!" "Name him! name him!" sounded through the house. "The sermon last night was McCheyne's." "That's so! That's so!" "I have the volume in my library." The accused arose and simply said: "It is a better sermon than I can write, and so I borrowed it." —Examiner and Chronicle.

"Just a Few Words about Adam."—This is the title of a half-essay, half-talk, by Gail Hamilton in the Christian Union. She does not like Adam, and we doubt not Adam would not have liked her. She says: "He had no temptation to speak of." We ourselves have always thought better of Adam than Gail does. He ate the apple because Eve was in for it any way, and he felt bound to see the old woman through.—Brooklyn Argus.

SUMNER AT THE STATE-HOUSE:

March 15, 1874.

Sunken in flowers, as on a meadow-bank,
Silent, unmoved, unheeding, sleeps the dead;
While, like a living river, rank on rank,
Pour the hushed people past his dreamless bed:
The proud and mighty State,
That in these halls so late
Undid the cruel wrong that she had done,
Sobbing, the wrong confessed,
Now folds him to her breast,—
Her great, pure, noble, glorious, godlike son!

And you, poor victims of a fate ill-starred,
Once Slaves, now Men! 'Tis well that ye are set
With reverent grief the precious dust to guard,
Though sheathed each sword and vain each bayonet.
Faithful was he, your friend—
Aye, to the bitter end!
Well are your dusky faces wet with tears;
His were your friends, your foes,
Your wrongs, your rights, your woes,
Your burdens and your bonds through weary years.

Alas, a nation weeps for thee to-day,
O thou who in thy post and harness died!
Reverenced in life, we reverence now thy clay,
With futile wreaths and garlands at thy side.
Young with eternal youth,
Strong with the strength of truth,
Shattering the waves to foamy fragments white,
Against Corruption's shock
Thou stood'st a granite rock,
O friend of Man, and hero of the Right!

Of all thy peers, thou didst not dread the sun;
While others cringed for place or stole for gain,
Thou wert the proud, the unsuspected one,
The "whitest soul" of all, without a stain.
Envy beset thy path,
And the envenomed wrath
Of Calumny was poured upon thy head;
But, heedless of applause,
Faithful to Freedom's cause,
Thou conquered'st at the last, by Justice led.

Farewell! Thy glorious monument is built,
Not in fair Auburn, but in myriad hearts;
Safe is the cause for which thy blood was spilt
From maddened violence and treacherous arts.
On other fields, unwon,
The battle must go on;
But o'er the smoke and turmoil of the war,
Above the angry scene,
In the blue depths serene,
Thy memory shall shine, a quenchless star!

GLIMPSES.

THE "CONGRESSIONAL PETITION" foots up 4,191 signatures; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 8,268.

ALL PERSONS circulating the petitions against church exemption from taxation will please send them in now as speedily as possible.

SIGNATURES TO THE "Massachusetts Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From Joseph Hoskins, Waltham, 77; from George L. Drew & Son, Cambridgeport, 18. Total for the week—95 names.

THE BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE has just printed several thousands more of the tract on "Equal Taxation and No Exemption." It will be as useful in other States as in Massachusetts; and Liberal Leagues, or other parties desiring to disseminate information on the subject, will be supplied at cost price, $2.50 a thousand, or thirty cents a hundred.

SIGNATURES TO THE "Congressional Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From Joseph Hoskins, Waltham, Mass., 38; from George L. Drew & Son, Cambridgeport, Mass., 18; from William Green, Santa Barbara, California, 9; from Lewis G. Janes, New York City, 19; from Benjamin Cobb, Jr., Dighton, Mass., 22. Total for the week—96 names.

THE LETTER OF Professor Newman, in another column, contains suggestions which we entirely approve. It is true, as he says, that the State ought not to accept the office of enforcing trust-deeds which require the perpetual teaching of any creed whatever; and it is equally true that the abolition of interest would not only be unjust, but would tend to promote extravagance and (in the long run) to make the poor still poorer.

ON A FIRE-BELL in Dorsetshire, England, is the following inscription, dated 1642:—

> "Lord, quench this furious flame!
> Arise, run, help, put out the same!"

This quaint distich ought to be quoted in connection with Cromwell's well-known—"Trust in the Lord, and keep your powder dry!" The writer's faith gave out at the end of the first line, and he had to fall back on fleshly means of extinguishing the conflagration.

THIS IS what the Catholic Union says on the school question: "The test of Catholicity in the United States to-day is the aid given to our bishops and priests to found Catholic schools for Catholic children. He who is indifferent to this matter, we care not what his pretensions may be, nor how sound may be the 'Catholic stock' whence he sprang, is virtually an enemy to the Church. The indices are everywhere around us that the sects have combined against us on this question. On the influences of the godless school-system antagonistic to Catholic faith depend their last hope."

THE DEATH of Charles Sumner is too full of meaning to be touched upon lightly or carelessly. Every one capable of appreciating the morally sublime must be profoundly affected by it. A sense of irremediable loss comes over us as we think of his vacant chair in the Senate; and the inestimable worth to our time of one who lived in public as in private by the light of great ideas becomes sadly apparent when we ask—"Who is to take his place?" A nobler lesson has never been taught by any public career; and it becomes a priceless heritage of instruction and inspiration to all that shall come after him. May the great light that still shines in the name he has left behind him illumine the whole future of America!

THE FOLLOWING amusing paragraph is taken from the Texas Christian Advocate, published in Galveston under date of Oct. 22, 1873. A copy of the paper was sent us at the time by one of our subscribers in that city, but got mislaid, and has only just turned up again. The editor is describing a "pulpit ear-trumpet." "We have three pulpits in Galveston arranged with fixtures to aid the deaf in hearing. Inside the pulpit is a large tin funnel with a wide open mouth, say twelve or eighteen inches across. This tapers down to the floor and continues in a tube, about an inch in diameter, under the floor of the church (to be out of the way) to the seat of the deaf person, where it comes up through the floor, and to it the tube of the ear-trumpet is attached, and the deaf person hears as through an ear-trumpet in ordinary conversation. There ought to be a space of three or four inches between the pulpit board and the top of the funnel; and it is best to cover the top of the funnel with wire, like a sifter, to keep out trash that might fill up the tube." We respectfully suggest that the "sifter" be fastened over the preacher's mouth, like a respirator. This arrangement will keep out the "trash" that might otherwise reach the ears of the hearing portion of his congregation, and thus protect all alike. We intend to apply for a patent on this improvement.

AT THE STATE HOUSE last Thursday, Mr. P. A. Collins, a Catholic lawyer, tried to scare the Committee on Just and Equal Taxation by saying that the movement to tax the churches "originated with the Index Association," whom he called "pretended reformers and philanthropists," and compared to the Communists. "The Communists," he said, "are the Index Association men of France and Italy. Equality is the dream of the socialist. This is a conflict between religion and irreligion," etc., etc. Father Healey, a well-known Catholic priest, referred to "the infidels" in a more guarded way, but in the same spirit. Rev. J. S. Dickerson (Baptist), of South Boston, had also his fling at "the infidels," and said that the petition against church-exemption had its origin either in "avarice" or in "mere, sheer, ribald, low-lived infidelity." All these gentlemen seemed to consider it righteous, just, and altogether lovely to make "the infidels" help pay the bills of the Church, by shifting on their shoulders the taxes for the protection it enjoys. Why not? What rights have "the infidels" that the Church is bound to respect? How dare these wicked people object to support a "dead-head church," as Mr. Parton stingingly styles it? We are sorry that this particular hearing of the Committee was not reported by the press; there was juiciness in it which would have been refreshing to our readers.

THE SPRINGFIELD (Massachusetts) Republican thus chronicles a pitiable illustration of the moral evils which spring out of sectarian rivalries: "A sad instance of denominational antagonism and depravity is furnished by a recent transaction in Charleston, S.C. The Baptists of the city, getting into financial straits, were sadly compelled to offer their church, worth $60,000, and one of the finest in the South, to their Methodist brethren, for $20,000. Before the Methodists accepted the bargain, however, the Baptists found other means of relieving their embarrassment, and earnestly begged that they might be allowed to withdraw their ruinous offer. But their pleading was in vain. Says Bishop Haven, in describing this little feat of catching the Baptists on the hip: 'Didn't the happy band shout for joy! They had prayed, and fasted, and wept; now they rejoiced, and feasted, and wept.' How very different the affair appears from a different stand-point may be inferred from the Church Union, which remarks 'that to purchase for $20,000 what was worth $60,000 was unfair, to force the bargain when the losers wished to recede was unkind, and to grab in this way from one denomination for another was unchristian.' Dr. Haven lauds the 'remarkable sagacity' of the reverend gentlemen through whom 'fasting' was thus changed to 'feasting.' We wonder how such things look from the stand-point of the 'great white throne.'"

"THE TWO THEISMS."

A paper by Professor Newman, in THE INDEX of February 26, with the above title, is so original and striking a contrast of two great types of theism, that it deserves a far more thorough consideration than we can give it in the limits of an editorial article. Yet we feel impelled not to leave unexpressed some reflections it awakened.

Under the names of "Greek" and "Hebrew" theism, Professor Newman delineates two forms of theism as if these were the only forms; whereas, as we hinted in a brief note at the time, there is a third form not identical with either of them, but rather embracing the truths of both in a higher synthesis. It may be best to restate some of the leading characteristics of these two forms in his own words, referring all who may be interested in the subject to the original article for fuller information.

1. Of "Greek theism" Professor Newman says: "The cardinal point of this is that it supposes God to have nothing, in him or of him, but general Law. He may be described as Force acting everywhere according to Law, under the guidance of Mind. He is supposed to be so absorbed in general action as to remain quite unobservant of the detailed results, or at least unconcerned about them. . . . He wishes the human race, as a whole, to attain its own perfection, but it is thought puerile to suppose him to attend to each individual; and, as favoritism would be a human weakness, he has no love and no care for any individual. Conversely, then, it would be gratuitous, unseemly, perhaps impossible for any of us to love him. . . . The prevalent tendency of Greek philosophy to that which Christians esteem to be pride and self-righteousness is perhaps to be ascribed to this cause. Man stood erect in the presence of man, with whom alone he recognized moral relations, and was not awed and abashed by contrasting his own moral imperfection with the essential holiness of God. Mr. F. E. Abbot probably extols this position of the Greek mind as manliness; for in his Impeachment of Christianity, he has attacked the modern religion vehemently on this ground. He says: 'It strikes a deadly blow at the dignity of human nature, and smites men with the leprosy of self-contempt.' But the phenomenon was older than Christianity."

We cannot forbear expressing surprise at such a misreading of our thought as these last words indicate, as if we considered it manliness to be unconscious of the contrast between human imperfection and the absolute purity of the Divine. The passage referred to, from which this singular misconception seems to have been derived, contains not the remotest allusion to the "Greek mind," or any ideas similar to those of the Greek mind, but simply points out the natural effect on human character of the Orthodox Christian doctrines of "total depravity" and "salvation by Christ alone;" it does not "attack the modern religion" (whatever Professor Newman may mean by that), but Christianity alone, of which it says: "It [Christianity] enjoins self-abhorrence as the first condition of the 'salvation' it offers—makes the denial of all 'worth or worthiness' in mankind the first step in the Christian life, and teaches that Christ will save those alone who have lost all faith in themselves and in their own power to escape the just wrath of God. It thus strikes a deadly blow at the dignity of human nature, extinguishes that noble sentiment of self-respect without which all high virtue is impossible, and smites men with the leprosy of self-contempt. It makes them crawl like reptiles before Christ—'their hands on their mouths, and their mouths in the dust.' It is the very abolition of true manliness among men." It is difficult to see how so just a man as Professor Newman could have applied this condemnation of certain Christian doctrines, which he rejects as unconditionally as we do, to any "position of the Greek mind" whatever, or any modern position at all resembling it. However innocently made, his misapplication of our words does us great wrong.

2. "I turn," says Professor Newman, "to Hebrew theism. It recognizes all in God which I have described as Greek theism, but adds something more, and that of prime importance. It does not suppose that he is absorbed, and as it were exhausted, in general action, but believes that he takes cognizance of individuals also. . . . The Hebrew theism maintains that the universal agency of the Divine Spirit is a FACT; and that the division of his innumerable acts into two classes, those which we can refer to a definable law and those in which no general law is discernible by us, is a division made to aid our finite minds. . . . To the Hebrew theist, God is emphatically 'a God who searches the heart.' He is regarded as dwelling in its recesses, and having (what can only be called) a joint-consciousness with the individual man. The worship is prevalently internal and unspoken, however pleasant the sympathetic enthusiasm of common worship when hearts are in unison. In creatures so imperfect as we, and especially in the novitiate of heart-religion, no small part of secret prayer will be, either petition for more strength to fulfil duty, or expression of grief for failures. An axiom of the religion is that God desires from us inward and outward goodness, holiness, and righteousness; hence any wilful neglect, any choice of the baser part instead of the better, is accounted not merely to be unjust or vicious, but also to be sin against God."

3. Without offering any criticisms whatever on these delineations of Greek and Hebrew theism, we would suggest that no form of modern theism can really reproduce either, so profoundly different is the whole atmosphere of modern society from that which the Greeks and Hebrews breathed. More especially, the form of theism which aims to be in perfect sympathy with the method, spirit, and results of science, and conceives itself to be only an anticipation of what will be ultimately recognized by all as the universal, positive teaching of science, will be found on examination to present features radically unlike those of either its Greek or its Hebrew prototypes. Some of these we will note here.

In the first place, both Greek and Hebrew theism rested on the assumption of supernatural revelation, while scientific theism affirms a naturalism which excludes all possibility of it. The Greeks and the Hebrews alike had their prophets, their inspired priests, their omens, signs, dreams, visions, prognostications of all sorts; while scientific theism relies exclusively on natural faculties common to all men. The whole basis is different, and so is the superstructure. To dwell on all that this implies is impossible, for a proper treatment of the subject would take volumes.

Scientific theism starts from the revelation of Nature. It studies the universe to learn, with deep reverence, what the universe has to say for itself. It does not accept the old scholastic distinction of noumenon and phenomenon, the former being unknowable and the latter only known; although this relic of an outgrown metaphysics is incorporated into the philosophy of John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer, it introduces a thoroughly unscientific element into their systems which science itself will at last cast out. Scientific theism holds that the ultimate Power whence all proceeds manifests itself in Nature, and is therefore not unknowable, though known only in part. The facts and laws of the universe, from the greatest to the least, reveal the infinite and omnipresent Energy of the All; the highest revelations of it are found in man, and the highest of all in the moral, intellectual, and affectional nature of man.

Scientific theism affirms the universal, not the merely general, action of this unitary Power, and finds it in particulars as well as in general laws. The evolution of the universe is a profound expression of its nature; and the orderly advance of all things towards perfected being becomes thus the supreme fact. Aspiration and effort after ideal perfection are the religion by which Nature herself lives; and human religion is but one phase of it. Throughout the whole of this process the ever-present and everywhere-present Power acts, in details no less than in general tendencies; and whatever characterizes this Power in the aggregate result equally characterizes it in each single step. But since there is no true creation except that of form, the progressive manifestations of Being indicate no increase or advance in Being itself, but merely in the mode of its activity. More cannot emerge at the end than was existent at the beginning; and the life of the universe is eternally complete.

In the idea of the Eternal Power whence all things proceed, therefore, scientific theism warns us not to take any human attributes, even the highest ones of wisdom, goodness, and love, as an adequate manifestation of it. These do indeed express its nature so far as it is manifested; but they are only hints of that which is as yet unmanifested. Not unknowable in itself (being known by itself), but as yet unknown by us, the great Power of All, as Spinoza well pointed out, must have infinite attributes unrevealed; and scientific theism is the last to forget the narrow attainments of human knowledge. But it rebukes the presumption of setting theoretical bounds to knowledge, and vindicates itself against the false humility which pretends to define its limits à priori. The idea of God it gives us is such as to call out our highest sentiments and hopes, to stimulate us to sincerer dealing with ourselves and nobler service of others, to foster the ideal life, to expand thought and affection alike to the utmost, and to exalt our entire being to the heights of calm repose. All the dignity and beauty of the older theisms abide still in the new; but the latter carries them up to the illumination of larger thought, and leads the truthful and brave mind onward towards a future of ever-nobler humanity.

CHRISTIANITY AND AMUSEMENTS.

A printed discourse on amusements brought a swift response from Philadelphia, in the form of a pamphlet on "The Incompatibility of Theatre-going and Dancing with Membership in the Christian Church," issued by the clergy of the Convocation of the Valley of Virginia to the people of their parishes, but put into wider circulation in answer to demands for it on the part of ministers and brethren of other denominations. The pages of the pamphlet were adorned with marginal notes calling the heretical reader's attention to the important paragraphs, and lines of special pith were vehemently underscored for his benefit. That the spirit of the pamphlet may be appreciated, a few of these are copied here. The opening sentence of the address, for such it is, tells the whole story. "We start with the proposition that the THEATRE has been through its whole history, and is now, a school of vice." "Vice is whitewashed and virtually commended. The name of God is blasphemously used, and piety ridiculed." "The grossest indecencies are the ordinary exhibition of the stage—such as immodest dances, with exposure of the female person: so that the theatre is, as it always has been, the habitual resort of the irreligious and the immoral." "Those who have looked most into the literature and facts of play-acting, ancient and modern, tell us that the indecencies of the present would not have been tolerated in the corrupt age of Charles II., and that the immorality of the stage is more gross now than when Collier wrote its history." "No sooner is a theatre built than it is surrounded with drinking houses and brothels which mark it as the way to perdition. The profession of the stage is notoriously immoral. Actors and actresses who come before the public and receive their applause are living in daily defiance of the laws of decency and morality." "The vice of the opera may be more subtle and difficult of apprehension, but it is not the less destructive on that account."

Carried away by his faith in tradition, the writer claims weight for his testimony in proportion to its antiquity, not seeming to suspect that its value, like that of many things beside, diminishes with age. He cites Sir Walter Scott (reign of George III.) and the "infidel Rousseau" (age of Louis XV.), and even takes comfort in the witness of Plato, Tacitus, and Seneca! The pamphlet, which is short—only eleven pages are devoted to the theatre,—contains as much pure prejudice as evangelical partisanship can compress within narrow limits, and betrays at once the absence of mental and moral perspective in people of the orthodox Protestant class. It must be remembered that the address we have quoted from was prepared in Virginia, but in these matters New York does not show her superiority to her Southern sisters as conspicuously as she does in other particulars. The temper of orthodox Protestantism is pretty much the same everywhere. When it is mitigated, the mitigation is due to the less acrid elements of the churchly spirit.

A day or two since the Episcopal Church Conference discussed, in the Church of the Incarnation, New York, the "Position of the Church towards Popular Amusements." The tone of the deliberations, as reported in the Times, contrasted singularly with that of the Virginia pastors, in whom the evangelical mind prevailed. Dr. Cornwall opened the discussion by quoting Paul's condemnation of rioting and revelling, and St. Peter's denunciation of comic sports; said the word rendered "hypocrites" in Christ's vituperation of the Scribes and Pharisees meant literally "actors," and that the Master's condemnation of the pretended prayers uttered by these hypocrites or actors was a complete rebuke of the pretended prayers used in many operas and dramas. Dr. Cornwall's speech had the true pharisaic ring, but it failed to elicit congenial responses from other members of the Conference. Dr. Rylance did not see the point of comparison between the "hypocrites" of the gospel and the modern actors. Dr. Osgood was of opinion that the purpose to be arrived at was the recreation of the people without dissipation. Dr. Wilde regretted the tone of Dr. Cornwall's remarks, and deprecated the fastening of an injurious imputation on the members of the theatrical profession. He was of opinion that Christian men might safely be guided by their private consciences in regard to amusement. Dr. Meyer cited St. Paul against Dr. Cornwall, to the effect that as "one man is strong and eateth all things, and another who is weak eateth herbs," each man ought to be persuaded in his own mind. Dr. Cowley recommended that Christians who needed recreation should take it, according to the dictates of their consciences, at a good play. He had himself, last year, in London, greatly enjoyed the acting of Mr. Irving in the play of "Charles I.," and wished that all his brethren could have the same privilege. Dr. Washburne declared that the authority of the Church on the subject of amusements was hard to define, and counselled wise men to educate their consciences by the best wisdom of the best people. The sum of opinion was, on the whole, in favor of the legitimate drama as opposed to the unhealthy productions of the stage.

The gentlemen who engaged in this debate were good churchmen, devout believers in the gospel, humble servants of authority, pure and godly men; but they were cultivated and reasonable, as the best churchmen often are—the heated, angry, contentious spirit of dogmatism being subdued by their confidence in their institution. The Church is said to represent the cultivated worldliness of religion, the calm, mellow spirit of generous indifference. Perhaps it does; but it also represents mental balance, the thoughtfulness of the historical intellect, which views things in their relations, and understands the close connections between the successive states of progress. What Matthew Arnold calls "sweet reasonableness" characterizes the best examples of the Episcopal clergy, and in proportion as they recede from the low-church to the high-church position civilization has less to fear from them than from the "hot gospellers" of the sects. In fact civilization gains from them almost as much as it loses from the zealous claquerors of the "Drama of Redemption." O. B. F.

LETTER FROM PROFESSOR NEWMAN.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I have watched with interest the controversy as conducted by you on two subjects: 1, on Church Establishments; 2, on Interest of Money. I have agreed with you, I believe, in all that you write; yet I have not thought that you went the whole length that you ought to go, and touched the heart of the questions. Because of my general agreement, I hope to be very concise in my remarks, trusting that sympathy will insure your understanding.

First, as regards establishment of a religion, I hold that, if the State undertake to enforce that money which I bequeath or give in trust shall be employed after my death for an indefinite time to teach my creed, the State thereby establishes my creed. Whence the money came, whether from my pocket or from the public treasury, is not the main question. The waste of the original money, if it was public, is a finite mischief; the mischief, if the creed be false, of the State enforcing that it shall be taught, is endless. Is the Indian government (whether in English or Indian hands) bound forever to support the enormities and absurdities of Brahminical religion, because some person bequeathed private money for the purpose? The idea is monstrous. In science it is not admitted for a moment. If I bestow funds to promote a science, I do not dictate the doctrine and creed of the science. I leave the teachers free; and the State, in the interest of truth and of the nation, may insist that the money shall be so appropriated. But when opposite creeds are endowed by individuals, to enforce the teaching of both is a sin against truth, and a national mischief. The only solution is that the State should decline all enforcement of creeds. If I put my money into the hands of trustees of my own choice, I shall probably secure that for some moderate time it shall not only promote the study, but even the doctrines, which I approve; and this is all that I can expect. Your Protestant sects must sacrifice enforcement of creeds by trust deeds, and thereby they will hinder the curse of an established Romanism now threatening you. I hold the same doctrine concerning Great Britain and Ireland, of course.

Next, concerning the interest of money. To deny its rightfulness is, you justly say, virtually to deny strict ownership. The error is the most noxious of all that float about in men's speculations, and may involve the most frightful results, if not exploded. But more needs to be said than I have read from you. Our economist, Nassau Senior, first assigned the moral reason why interest is due on money lent: namely, Interest is the reward of abstinence. Let me expand this. If I have the equivalent of ten thousand pounds, —it matters not in what form, whether ingots of gold, or bales of cloth, or masses of iron, or manufactured hardware, or shares in a railroad—it will enable me to gratify myself in many ways according to my taste. I may spend it in personal indulgence, as in house, equipages, gardens, foreign travel; or in earning popularity by liberality to the public; or again, I may use it in generous gifts to distant kinsfolk, who expected nothing from me; or in philanthropic schemes; or in an expensive promotion of science. To delay using it is to risk the total loss of it by my death. If laborers come to me, begging that I will not enjoy it according to my own taste, but will employ it in maintaining them, and I yield to their prayer, will they at the year's end claim that I shall only regain my ten thousand pounds without increase? If that be justice, then my money may be taken from me next year and the year after, for their convenience, and with the loss of my own enjoyment. How then am I the better for being the nominal owner? If the process be continued till my death, I have been totally deprived of it. To say nothing of the risk of not recovering at the year's end (which ought to make interest higher), for the bare fact of delaying enjoyment I ought to be recompensed. If interest were not allowed, then to employ laborers would be no transaction of the market, but a mere philanthropic action; and since not all are philanthropists, the result would be to promote rapid and all but universal spending, except where property could be hoarded. The whole nation would be impoverished, and the poorest would suffer most. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

WESTON SUPER MARE, Feb. 27, 1874.

THE HAMPTON INSTITUTE.

We have received a Catalogue of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, Virginia.

This institution appears from the report to be doing a large and good work in the South. It is grappling with the great problem of industrial education, under circumstances which at first sight might seem especially discouraging, and at the same time is doing a great deal toward supplying the great need of the South for public school teachers.

We have always regretted that this work should be encumbered by any sectarian associations, and are glad to learn that it now stands quite independent of the American Missionary Association, with which it was at first connected.

The American Missionary Association has done a great deal of good in establishing schools at the South; but in one view it has undone to a great extent with one hand what it did with the other, in ministering to the religious excitability of these people, and in fostering their prejudices against a broad, secular public school system.

So we regret to see in General Armstrong's report that, after claiming on page twenty-four "that it depends on no sect, for it is undenominational," he goes on to say: "Yet it is decidedly Christian in teaching, and expects its graduates will become as useful evangelists as educators." What does he mean by this word evangelists? Simply good, earnest, upright citizens, or representatives of a certain set of doctrines, or a phase of religion which has received the technical name "evangelical"?

If he is making good farmers and teachers, he is doing a great work for Virginia; but "evangelizing," after the commonly received meaning of that word, seems to me the last thing that is needed there.

But we cannot afford to spare any good, energetic work among these people, even if it is not quite according to our ideas of what is best for them; and we feel that the Hampton school is very valuable, for its great lessons of labor and economy. We trust that under its independent management it will become more and more free from any taint of theological basis, and so serve to bring its great principle of industrial education nearer to the public school system, which can only stand on the broad ground of unsectarian secular education. E. D. C.

A VALUABLE TABLE of the statistics of Christianity is presented in Prof. A. J. Schem's Statistics of the World for 1873, just published in New York and London. In North and South America, out of a population of 84,500,000, 47,000,000 are Roman Catholics, and 30,000,000 Protestants. In Europe, out of a population of 301,000,000, 147,000,000 are Roman Catholics, 71,800,000 Protestants, and 70,200,000 adherents of the Greek Church. In Asia, out of a population of 794,000,000, 4,700,000 are Roman Catholics, 1,800,000 Protestants, and 8,500,000 adherents of the Eastern Churches. In Africa, out of a population of 192,500,000, 1,100,000 are Roman Catholics, 1,200,000 Protestants, and 3,200,000 adherents of the Eastern Churches. In Australia and Polynesia, out of a population of 4,400,000, 400,000 are Roman Catholics, and 1,500,000 Protestants.—Globe.

ESSAYS ON EDUCATIONAL REFORMERS. By Robert Herbert Quick, M. A., Trin. Coll. Cam., Late Second Master in the Surrey County School, and formerly Curate of St. Mark's, Whitechapel. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1874.

Since the chief hope of progress in anything truly valuable lies in the broad and enlightened education of the young, everything tending to aid in this great work should be heartily welcomed. We have not yet arrived at anything which can be called the science of education. That there are, in the underlying nature of things, the elements of such a science, it cannot be doubted. This work of Mr. Quick would furnish aid in the construction of such a science. He gives the views of the chief educational reformers, from the time that method in teaching came to be recognized as important. Prominent among these are the Jesuits, Ascham, Montaigne, Milton, Locke, Rousseau, Pestalozzi, and Herbert Spencer. The history given of the efforts and experiences of some of these men is of no small interest. To these accounts, the author, who is a practical teacher, adds some ideas of his own. The work is recommended to the attention of school boards, superintendents of schools, and teachers. By making themselves familiar with the best elements of each system, and by coördinating them in their due relativity, some advance might be made upon the present systems of education which are so inadequate to the production of the desired result—that of preparation for "complete living." RECORD OF MR. ALCOTT'S SCHOOL, exemplifying the Principles and Methods of Moral Culture. Third Edition, revised. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1874.

This work is a republication of Miss Peabody's Record of a School, published thirty-eight years ago. Mr. Alcott's name might be added to the above list of educational reformers; for he as truly had a system of his own, and one quite unique in its application. His method was mainly Socratic, involving little use of books. This he applied largely to subjects of a metaphysical nature, leading the little children, under ten years, into habits of close self-inspection and of mental and spiritual analysis. While some valuable results might come from such an exercise, it is very much to be doubted whether so great a stimulus, applied to tender minds of that age, can be healthful. Besides, the general tone of the questions could not but indicate, in some measure, the answers expected; and thus the minds of the children would be forestalled with certain notions, the authority for which lay only in the mind of the teacher, and concerning which it would seem much better to leave the mind of the child unbiassed, until, by increased knowledge and farther development, it should be in a proper condition to investigate for itself, and to come independently to its own conclusions. Miss Peabody herself says she "has come to doubt the details of his method of procedure, and thinks he will not disagree with her that Froebel's method of cultivating children through artistic production, in the childish sphere of affection and fancy, is healthier." Mr. Alcott's plan furnishes suggestions which may be very valuable to teachers; and readers of Miss Alcott's Little Men will find an interest in this book from the fact that some of the scenes of that story were suggested by her father's school which this Record delineates. WHICH?

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I observe that in THE INDEX of Feb. 26 you (apparently) justify the refusal to pay taxes by Mr. and Mrs. Foster, on the ground that "taxation without representation is tyranny." In the next paragraph but one, you urge that "all property . . . belonging to the inhabitants of this State . . . shall be subject to taxation." Suppose female suffrage should be delayed till after May 1, 1874—and we may have as long to wait for it as we did for emancipation, say till thirty years from now,—do you think that in the interval the property of women should be legally or morally exempted from taxation? Because, in that case, prudent husbands will make haste to put their property in their wives' names, and prudent religious or charitable societies—very likely manufacturing corporations as well—will make over their title to female proprietors. Why not?

"Taxation without representation is tyranny." But women, though the most numerous, are not the only victims. There are the sick, infirm, non-residents, and absentees, who might vote by letter or proxy, but are not allowed. There are minors and imbeciles, whose property is held in guardianship. There are foreigners, not naturalized, who hold great amounts of taxable property. There are those who for conscientious scruples do not vote, like the old-time abolitionists before the war. Lastly, there are honest voters always in a hopeless minority, who are worse than not represented, because *mis*represented. Suppose we exempt them all. Why not?

Truly yours, J. H. A.

[1. We think that, until the State accords to women the right to vote, it should not tax them in full for protection which is incomplete. It can justly tax them only for the measure of protection it actually affords. What abatement of taxes should be made on this account, we do not pretend to decide; let the women be heard on this subject. This is not to "exempt" their property at all, but simply to act consistently with the principle that taxation is based on protection, and should be proportioned to it. The "prudent husbands" or "societies" should be treated precisely like any other rascals who seek to defraud the government.

2. The "sick, infirm, non-residents, and absentees" can all vote, if they only go to the polls; there is no injustice in requiring voters to cast their ballots in person, this being the only way to prevent countless frauds. Imbeciles cannot vote, because they do not know the meaning of the act; and if our friend thinks all women are fools, he might properly enough disfranchise them on this account. Minors are represented by their guardians, until they outgrow their minority. Foreigners can all vote by waiting a few years, as minors can. The "conscientious voters" can all vote, if they have a mind to. The "honest voters" are simply unfortunate in being outvoted. All these classes get the protection they are taxed for; if not, they are unjustly taxed. But women, by their own showing, do not get the protection they are taxed for. That is the difference.

PROFESSOR NEWMAN'S THEISM.

MR. EDITOR:—

Professor Newman's idea of omniscience falls below the Christian theory of faith; or, at least, it is cognate to that theory. Jesus pronounced faith omnipotent, when he declared (Mark ix., 23) that "all things are possible to him that believeth." But if we use Prof. Newman's term, it will express the Christian theory of faith. It is "much-mighty;" if not all-mighty, it is nearly so, when brought to bear upon one's own imaginations, hopes, fears, and the views he takes of himself. For we should bear in mind that Prof. Newman's range of subjects suitable for "prayer" does not extend beyond human emotions; which, of course, can be excited by ideas and dogmas, without Theism. "Faith" sets no broken bones; it does not suddenly heal fresh wounds.

Nor is it possible to show that faith in any case ever does anything outside of the mind in which it is excited. All that bears the name of an "experience" in Christianity is nothing more nor less than the views which the enforcement of certain theological dogmas have induced the victim to take of himself, good or bad, as the case may be. The emotions, the feelings, are real: but how are they induced? If the answer be, "By prayer and faith," then we know what kind of Theism that is which "prays" to an idea.

Faith is the power by which ideas are formed, not as to the fact, but as to the identity of all invisible personages. It is that act of human credulity which creates for itself the demonstration upon which the mind implicitly relies; and this evidence, thus self-induced, becomes the "substance of things hoped for." (Hebrews xi., 1.)

This is the power that "answers prayer" and renders the mind conscious of what God does, when we cannot "refer his acts to any definable law." It is the eye that sees an invisibility. It is the function that describes the indescribable. It gives a knowledge of the unknowable. It hears the inaudible. It searches the unsearchable, and it finds that which is "past finding out."

And how "much-mighty" this faith is, we may infer from the fact that we are told that God himself is powerless, and can work no miracle where this state of the human mind does not exist. This "much-mighty" faith is an act performed by the human mind for itself, that act by which certain emotions and certain views of our relation to him, as an invisible personage, are self-induced. It changes the heart, and fills it with "joy in believing." It answers prayer, and renders the Christian conscious of an "indwelling," invisible personage. It was this same power that gave eyes to Jesus for seeing the devil fall like lightning from heaven (Luke x., 18); and by it Jesus was convinced that Peter's own brains did not evolve the idea he had expressed respecting his Messiahship (Matthew xvi., 17).

There are in Nature and the constitution of things all the elements and all the forms of Force, sufficient for the development of all the phenomena that come within the reach of human knowledge. It is only in respect to things purely imaginary that the Christian idea of "faith" is applicable. But the Goodness, the Power, and the Wisdom evinced in the constitution of the universe suggest the ideas we form of the Absolute, or Divine; and in these laws, unoriginated, independent, and indestructible, we find a solid base for trust and hope. The God that is does the whole or nothing. It is "faith" in mysticism that sees a "division" in the phenomena that occur, attributing a part only to laws that inhere in Nature, and the balance to the volition of an invisibility acting independently of Nature. Were any such faculty inherent in the human mind as is assumed by this theory of "faith," it is not easy to see what there would be left for God to do.

Manifestly, it is this "much-mighty" faith that makes all the difference pointed out by Prof. Newman between the Grecian and the Hebrew Theisms. When speaking of this difference, it certainly was a fitting occasion for him to have recognized this "much-mighty" principle of faith which makes what he calls "a chasm between Theists who pray and The-ists who do not pray." By prayer he means petitioning one's own idea of God to do something he never would do if not incited to it by our "prayer."

All honest effort, all the love of virtue for virtue's sake, and all earnest aspiration for excellence in all the attributes of a harmonious manhood, it seems, are not "prayer" according to Prof. Newman's Theism. Such, then, is the difference which "faith" or no faith in mysticism makes in the estimates which good men form of one another.

THE LATE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT CONVENTION---A TELLING ARTICLE FROM THE PITTSBURGH "COMMERCIAL."

PITTSBURGH, Pa., Feb. 24, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Friend,—Stopping for a day in this "Iron City," I find the enclosed keen and clear criticism and statement, touching the late National Convention held here to amend God into the Constitution! Doubtless its statement must be correct, or a leading daily journal like the Commercial would hardly publish it. If nine-tenths of the delegates were from this near vicinity, only a pitiful single hundred came up "to the help of the Lord against the mighty" from all the forty thousand clergy and the millions of their lay members—a sign of good sense in the great company who honored this gathering by their absence.

I judge you will use the article in THE INDEX, and I shall see it when I get home to Detroit.

Truly yours,

G. B. STEBBINS.

THOMAS PAINE'S POLITICAL SERVICES.

YORK, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—In THE INDEX of Feb. 19, in an article on "Thomas Paine's Birthday," I find the following: "Dr. Paoli delivered an extended oration on the services of Mr. Paine in the cause of American liberty;" and—"The glorious Declaration of American Independence set forth his creed," etc.

Having never read his life, I was led to believe, from articles of the same tenor often seen in print, that Mr. Paine was in America, and exercised a personal influence in framing the Declaration of Independence. I am told by those who should know that this is not true; and, if not, I should be glad to know what services he rendered to the cause of American liberty.

An early answer in THE INDEX will oblige

A CONSTANT READER.

"GREAT FIRST CAUSE."

In the History of the Hebrew Monarchy, the learned author, after recounting the "train of atrocities" which Elijah's message [to Jehu] "entailed on both the Hebrew kingdoms," proceeds: "That Jewish writers can gloat over such funereal events, so deadly to their own people, is sufficiently wonderful. That men called Christians can read them with calm approbation is still more melancholy; for this is the training of mind which steeled all Europe to cruelty under the name of religion. This has lit up hell-fires in Christendom; this has bequeathed, even to the present age, a confusion of mind which too often leads those who are naturally mild and equitable to inflict hardship, vexation, degradation, and loss, on the profession of a rival creed. Until men learn that Jehovah neither does, nor ever did, such enormities as Elisha commanded and Jehu executed, they will never have a true insight into the heart of Him who is the God of the Pagan as well as of the Jew."

It is thought that so accurate a writer as Professor Newman would hardly have written the last sentence to-day. When, in 1847, he produced the admirable work from which the above is quoted, the confusion of mind which calls the Infinite God by the name of the Jewish Jehovah was almost universal. It was very natural that it should be so; and, educated as the greater part of the community had been, it was almost unavoidable. But it does not require much reflection to recognize the truth that Jehovah, however lofty, however awful his attributes, was still a defined Being, and so immeasurably distinguished from the Infinite and Incomprehensible Creator whose ineffable qualities and whose unconditional existence are beyond all human imagination.

This distinction was clearly in the mind of Pope when he wrote—

THE UNIVERSAL PRAYER.

DEO OPT. MAX.

Father of All! in every age,
In every clime, adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord!

To change the subject, and revert to the remarkable volume first quoted, it is matter of astonishment that it has so slightly attracted the attention of the reading public. To a student of history, it is invaluable; to a lover of the Bible, charming; and to one who may be neither, but whose mind is full (as whose is not?) of ideas more or less numerous and distinct, obtained from sermons, from reading, or from the current talk of men, it is magical; so vividly does it bring out, and so orderly reduce to system, the floating images which have long dwelt in his memory as things necessarily misty and chaotic. It will amuse the reader, if he will ask the first intelligent friend he meets whether he knows anything of Omri, or even if he can tell what was in the mind of Jezebel and Jehu when she asked him, "Had Zinori peace, who slew his master?"

The answer will probably be negative. And yet, leaving out the supernatural element, there are few pages in the Old Testament more dramatic or picturesque than those which recount the doings of the persons in question (I. Kings, xvi). The reason why they are so little known is, doubtless, that they are not valuable for the purposes of the ordinary sermonizer.

It is matter of regret that Mr. Bayne, in his fine poem "Jezebel," has allowed himself to impute to the Syrian princess an infidelity to her husband for which even her religious foes, the Hebrew historians, give no warrant. The rude word so commonly used by those writers to represent alienation from Jehovah, and turning to other gods, can hardly have misled the accomplished poet.

The sins of Jezebel were, like those of her great enemy, Elisha, justified to her, as his were to him, by supposed duty to the King of Heaven; and her immorality in killing Naboth, for the purpose of acquiring his vineyard for her husband, can hardly be considered by her severest critic to be greater than that of Elisha, when he stimulated Jehu to murder his sovereign in order to mount his throne.

Mr. Newman falls into no such errors. He treats every character in his history with candor, and with a desire to do exact justice, which is at once obvious and fascinating. To read his History is to gain a year of life.

HORSE-CAR RELIGION.

NEW YORK, Jan. 24, 1873.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The other day, when riding on a Broadway street-car, a colporteur stepped on, and, showing a permit to the conductor, at once gave to each man, woman, and child in the car the following tract from the American Tract Society:—

YET ALIVE.

Lord! and am I yet alive?
Not in torments, not in hell;
Still does thy blest Spirit strive?
With the chief of sinners dwell?
Tell it unto sinners—tell
I am, I am out of hell!

O the length and breadth of love!
Jesus, Savior, can it be?
All thy mercy's depth I prove,
All its height is seen in me.
Tell it unto sinners—tell
I am, I am out of hell!

Reader, whosoe'er thou art, rejoice to know that mercy's door is yet open to THEE. Closed! forever closed to that companion of thine who lived and died a despiser of God's grace, but still open to thee. O how does he wonder at his past folly, and what worlds would he give for one more offer of a free pardon! But alas, it is now TOO LATE! Reader, are you a forgiven sinner? If not, then are you in danger every moment of dropping into hell! Be entreated NOW to come to the Lord Jesus Christ, who came down from heaven to seek and to save the lost. Listen to his kind, inviting voice: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Come, then, just as you are, to this only and all-sufficient Savior, whose blood "cleanseth from all sin," and come NOW ere the door of mercy be forever closed. Why will you die? O have pity upon your own precious, inconceivably precious soul! To-morrow may be too late! and then ETERNITY! ETERNITY! Come, come to Jesus, and he will give you grace here, and eternal glory hereafter. Read Luke xv. and John iii.

TRACT SOCIETY, 805 Broadway, New York. [No. 73.]

The distributor was a stalwart fellow about fifty years old, and looked as if he was conferring a great favor on us by his labors. As I had some distance to ride, I had a chance to observe that not a single passenger who read the appeal appeared frightened, or half so much alarmed as he would to have seen a fire-engine thundering along the street. Not even a woman or child looked sober and thoughtful over the little missive.

I think you ought to print it as an argument in favor of Free Religion, and against the Tract Society that spends millions of the money that kindly, well-disposed people give for good and not evil purposes. The Tract Society is a great moral and religious nuisance, foul with the decaying superstitions of centuries.

"INFINITE" ATTRIBUTES.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In a recent number of your paper, Mr. Chadwick puts the question: "Have men had no reason to believe in a God of Infinite Power, and Wisdom, and Goodness?" To which you reply—in part—as follows: "If science cannot show that the belief in God, as infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, rests indeed on reason, it will be concluded, not only that men 'had no reason' to believe in him, but that they have none now."

To me one thing seems certain; namely, that it is incorrect to say that there is a God of infinite wisdom, goodness, and power. The statement is clearly disproved by the fact of human suffering. We know nothing of any "goodness" which does not include a desire to prevent pain. To say, then, that God is infinitely good is to say that he has an infinite desire to prevent pain. No one, I think, will dispute this. But if God has this infinite desire to prevent suffering, and cannot prevent it, then it is clear that his power is not equal to his goodness; for it is not sufficient to enable him to do what his goodness makes him desire to do. Perhaps our Orthodox friends, with their usual perspicacity, would say that he has the will and the power to prevent it, but does not think best to do so; but I credit your readers with sufficient clear-headedness to perceive that this would be a mere evasion of the difficulty. What shall we say, then?—that there is no God? For my own part, I believe in God, but I believe also in an eternal Necessity which includes God.

If any of our friends feel shocked at this, let me ask them whether it is better to believe in a God who would prevent all suffering, but cannot; or in one who would and can, but does not?

TRIBUTES TO SUMNER.

Scarcely any man who has occupied a prominent place in our history in the last quarter of a century has excited more hostile criticism or more violent attacks upon himself than Charles Sumner; and yet, now that the great Senator is dead, all men pause to do him reverence. His decease came like a general bereavement, and all felt that something great and good had passed out of the world, and it was the poorer for the loss. Every token of sorrow and every testimonial of respect that human thought and solicitude can devise will be shown in his native city, in the State that should be proud to own him as her son, in the nation, and throughout the world, where there is any regard for the heroic and the grand in the human character. Executive officers of the Government do all that comes within their province to see that the proper honors are paid to him; the legislative bodies of the nation, the State and the city, pass laudatory resolutions and pronounce eulogies; the courts of every grade will take due notice of the great jurist's departure from earthly tribunals; scores of private organizations will make it a matter nearly concerning them; the press is for once unanimous in its expressions, and the whole nation is "contracted in one brow of woe." And yet the man who has gone was not a popular man; he never compromised or conciliated; he never stooped to secure the favor of any man or body of men; he never swerved for fear of giving offence. Therefore in his time he made many enemies. He had been the subject of calumny and abuse, of vituperation and cursing; and yet, when his great spirit has left this scene of petty contention, there is none to say a word of disparagement.

What is the reason of this universal sorrow, and this quick forgetfulness of past animosities? Is it not the instant recognition, when death has brought every one to a sober judgment, and the expression of his real opinion, that, whatever differences of opinion on policies and theories there might be, whatever faults and failings of temper might be his, a man has gone from us whose motives were always above question, whose aims were his country's, God's and truth's; whose integrity and fearless advocacy of what he believed to be right were the cause of the hatred which he excited in unscrupulous and designing men, and of the dislike with which he was often regarded by those who were merely weak or short-sighted? Moreover, time had justified, in a large measure, the position which he held in the heated controversies of the past, and men had come to regard him as one whose foresight or whose instinctive adherence to principles which were just and right placed him above hasty criticism; yet he has often been subjected to hasty criticism, even in these later years, when any position that he took should have been regarded with consideration and judged with calmness. This was because he never yielded to prejudice, nor was carried away by the breath of public opinion. Once his native State, which he had served so well and honored by his lofty devotion to patriotism and the demands of justice and liberty, cruelly misjudged him, and passed a censure that must have cut his mighty heart; but Massachusetts may well congratulate herself that he lived until she had undone this great wrong, and her reparation was duly announced in the councils of the nation.

All the animosities of the past are forgotten in the presence of death, and when men are called upon to form a final judgment upon the great advocates of freedom, of justice and equality, and of peace and good-will, they find that all his faults were the frailties of nature, which they dare not draw from their dread abode, and that his other qualities were such as should receive the admiration of all good men, such as we can ill afford to lose from the ranks of our public men at this time. Now, more than ever, do we feel the need of men who not only have the mighty grasp of intellect and the invincible panoply of learning and eloquence, but stern integrity and devotion to right and truth, men who can rise above selfish purposes, and labor with singleness of heart for the general good and the advancement of justice.—Globe, March 13.

WE QUOTE THE following from the Catholic Review: "In a very ancient Florentine manuscript appears the following curious legendary description of drunkenness: 'When Adam first planted the vine, Satan came and watered it, first with the blood of a peacock, then with that of a monkey, that of a lion, and finally with that of a pig. This is why the vine's fruits bear all the characteristics of these four animals. When a man takes his first glass of wine he is exalted, and his vanity (the peacock) comes to the surface; at his second, the fumes of the liquor mount still higher, and he is so gay and at the same time so silly, that he at once reminds people of a monkey; then he quaffs still more deeply, loses his temper, and is a lion in his rage; lastly, he falls on the ground and wallows in the dust like a pig.'" of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12	Insertions,	10c	per	line.
" 13 " 25	"	8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"	6	"	"
" 52	"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS.

Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

BUST OF

THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished n plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

IN RESIGNING the leadership of the Liberal Party in England, it is expected that Mr. Gladstone has in view the retirement from the House of Commons to the House of Lords. We should think he would much rather be a man than a "lord."

DURING THE past year, the highest salary received by any clergyman in this State was $8,000; the lowest was $162—this on the authority of the Bureau of Labor. We suppose it is by no means certain which of these two ministers preached the better sermons, or did the better work.

THE Pall Mall Gazette says that the total number of Jewish "communities," in Prussia, is about eight hundred. Some of these are "reform" Jews, and some "orthodox." During the last year, fifty-three new synagogues have been built in Prussia, and the number of Jewish schools in the country is four hundred and eighty-four.

JOHN RUSKIN pathetically says: "I am left utterly stranded and alone in life and thought." This surely cannot be so! A man who has helped so many to rare visions of the beautiful in the world of Nature and of art, and quickened in so many the germs of æsthetic culture, as has Mr. Ruskin, certainly cannot be forgotten, nor thought of but with the deepest sympathy and the sincerest admiration.

THE BOSTON Journal says: "While reading the records of crime, and glancing at the criminal statistics furnished by our own State, we sometimes doubt whether our Massachusetts system of looking after and caring for what may be termed the depraved classes is not radically wrong." We hope this sage writer in the Journal will pursue his doubt until he arrives at some wise and satisfactory solution of it.

JOAQUIN MILLER, in The Independent, relates the following anecdote, which, while he does not "vouch for the truth of," he says "is very current at the clubs":—

"It is said that when the Emperor of Brazil came to London he spent his first day in Westminster Abbey. The next day he visited the tomb of Coleridge, in the morning, and then in the evening met the Queen. 'And how has your majesty spent the day?' said the Queen. 'I have been visiting the grave of Coleridge,' replied the Emperor. 'And who is Coleridge?' said the Queen."

THE GIST of Robert Owen's social philosophy may be stated in the following conclusions to which he came: "That the world has reached a point of progress at which coöperative industry should replace competitive labor; and that society, discarding large cities and solitary homes, should resolve itself into associations, each of fifteen hundred or two thousand persons, who should own land and houses in common, and labor for the benefit of the community."

"IT IS WITH the modern stage," says the Brooklyn Eagle, "as with the modern pulpit—it seeks to live for and by popularity." Such wholesale statements, while they contain a good deal of truth, convey an impression which is largely unjust. They may state the rule well enough, but they allow nothing for its exceptions. Without doubt there are many actors, and many ministers, who are honestly striving to be true to their calling, and who are inspired with a high conception of its place among the important vocations of the world.

REV. DR. TALMAGE of New York, in his sermon on Mr. Sumner's sudden death, "improves the opportunity" to inculcate the "salvation" doctrine. This is the way in which he points the moral; this is the lively manner in which he seeks to precipitate his young men into making their "calling and election sure:"—

Be quick, the moments dart past; be quick, the hour of your dissolution hastens; be quick, the day of grace is closing; be quick, lest some slight paralysis strike your brain, as it did our venerable ex-President, or like the Senator who now lies in state waiting for interment. You feel a pain at the heart, and you have only time to cry, "Oh! oh!" and you are gone. God forbid that after so many emphatic warnings, you should lose your soul.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY delivered his inaugural address, as Rector of the University of Aberdeen, on February 27. His theme was, "Higher education, and the place which science should occupy in University culture." His ideal of a University, he said, was a place in which thought was free from all fetters, and in which all sources of knowledge, and all aids to learning, were free to all comers without distinction of creed or country, riches or poverty. "The act which commenced with the Protestant Reformation," says the professor, "is nearly played out, and a wider and deeper change than that effected three centuries ago is waiting to come on; nay, is visible behind the scenes to those who have good eyes." We can but think that Professor Huxley is a true prophet.

REV. MR. MURRAY, in speaking of his needed vacation, says he finds it incumbent upon him to rest from all "religious labors." We suppose from this that Mr. Murray does not think that his fast driving over the Brighton road is "religious." Well, if it is not religious, what makes him do it?—for we presume that, in his long vacation, he does not propose to refrain altogether from exercising his horses; and if fast driving does not come under the head of religion, it must come under that of irreligion. And between April 1 and October 1 will Mr. Murray be an irreligious man, or will he somehow contrive to introduce a little religion into his vacation sports and pastimes? Poor religion! what a pity it can't have every day in the week instead of only one, and the whole of a man instead of only a part of him!

THE NEW YORK Tribune says: "It is the accuracy with which so many of our half-educated, or self-educated, men write and speak English which is surprising; and there is nothing like it, we suspect, anywhere else in the world." "Small mistakes are made, as they are by the best writers; but nobody notices them except professional teachers, who, in their turn, make just as many." The ability to speak and write good plain English is, indeed, an excellent accomplishment,—one which no person, born to the English tongue, should neglect to acquire for the sake of any other. But every man has, to a greater or less extent, his own vernacular, in which he can express himself better than by copying any standard; and no amount of technical preciseness in any language will atone for the lack of unstudied naturalness and native vigor.

MARY CLEMMER AMES, in writing from Washington to the Brooklyn Argus, takes exception to the inference drawn from the fact that, at the death-bed of Mr. Sumner, "there was lack of woman's nursing and lack of woman's tears." She says:—

It was not the privilege of any woman to minister to him in his hours of mortal anguish, nor to hold his hand as his mighty spirit started on its final passage; but not even the death of Lincoln evoked from so many women's eyes so many loving tears. . . . His truth, his honor, his devotion to human freedom, appealed to their higher nature, and made him through life a hero to women. His Greek passion for beauty, his exquisite tastes, his wonderful culture, which had gleaned in every field of human knowledge, at once appealed to, and sufficed the æsthetic nature of, the highest order of women; while the marvellous sweetness of his smile, the gentleness of his courtesy, his reverence for the highest ideal of womanhood, made him ever in their eyes, from first to last, "the stainless knight," the ideal man.

Religion and the Science of Religion.

TENTH LECTURE IN THE COURSE OF SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES, DELIVERED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, MARCH 8, 1874.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

John Stuart Mill begins his book on Political Economy with this paragraph: "In every department of human affairs, practice long precedes science; systematic inquiry into the modes of action of the powers of Nature is the tardy product of a long course of efforts to use those powers for practical ends. The conception, accordingly, of political economy as a branch of science, is extremely modern; but the subject with which its inquiries are conversant has in all ages necessarily constituted one of the chief practical interests of mankind, and, in some, a most unduly engrossing one." If we were to put the word religion in place of political economy in this paragraph, the language would indicate the thought most prominent in my mind when I named "Religion and the Science of Religion" for the subject of this lecture. Thus changed, the paragraph might stand very appropriately at the beginning of a treatise on the science of religion, even to the last clause, that the subject with which the science of religion is conversant has been in some ages "an unduly engrossing interest of mankind." But the chief point which the language thus changed would call attention to is this: that when we speak of the "science of religion," or when it is said, as it sometimes is, that religion is "to be put on a scientific basis," we cannot mean that the science of religion is to create religion; we cannot mean that religion is now to be built up as it were de novo; that it is a kind of mental condition and life now to be erected purely by a knowledge of scientific principles on a basis never before known, but which science has contrived; that it is to be constructed like the proposed great East River bridge at New York, by scientific mechanics on a foundation which scientific art is to lay: not at all; but we mean that science is just beginning to investigate the phenomena of religious history and experience; just beginning to push "systematic inquiry" into this branch of human development as it has previously into the phenomena of language, of ethnology, of government, and so forth; just beginning to classify and generalize the facts of religion. The phrase "science of religion" assumes that religion has already existed in "practice;" that it has had a source, beginning, and career, and that there have been certain "modes of action of the powers" that produced it, entirely independent of the "science" that would now study it. All that science can aim to do is to correlate these facts and powers of religion, after they have been sifted and reduced by modern tests of historical criticism, with other facts and experiences of human nature; to trace them, if possible, to their origins, and to prove them to hold a natural and legitimate place in human development.

The saying, therefore, that religion is to be put on a scientific basis may be questionable as leading to a misapprehension; for what the science of religion really attempts to do is to show the actual basis of religion as it already exists in the facts of human nature and human history. A more discriminating choice of language would seem to be that we are to find a scientific authentication of religion rather than a scientific basis. What is to be put on a scientific basis is the study of religion rather than religion itself. Since religion existed before the study of it began, existed before any science of religion was ever thought of, so its basis must have existed before science or philosophy ever began to talk of its basis. And those who are now interesting themselves in the science, who are really building the science, of religion, are no more expecting to construct a new religion on some new basis now to be established, than those who are versed in the science of language expect to introduce a new tongue which they have scientifically constructed, or than ethnologists expect to create a new race of men by a studied and artificial application of the principles which they call the science of ethnology. Languages and races grow—they are not made; the earth itself has grown; and so religion is an organic growth, not a mechanical structure. And as geology has not made a new earth, but revealed to us the structure of the old earth which the human race has always inhabited, and disclosed the long-continuing processes by which it was shaped; as ethnology is revealing to us how the different races and nations of mankind are related to each other, and how from certain common centres, or from one centre, they have spread over the earth and gradually developed the differences that exist to distinguish them to-day; as the science of language is proving the kinship of the various languages spoken by man, and showing that the art of language was a slow natural formation under the discipline of experience, advancing apparently with the progress of man out of barbarism to civilization; as the new science, biology, is unfolding and classifying the facts that indicate a similar kinship in the various forms of organic life, and is tracing amidst all differences and processes of differentiation the signs of a possible common lineage back to some one remote life-centre,—so scientific students of religion are beginning to note the facts in the history of religious development, which indicate relationship and sympathy where we have been wont to see only separation and antagonism, evolution where we have looked for special creation, natural affiliation with other phases of human history where there has been supposed to exist an impassable chasm which only miracle could bridge—are beginning to note, classify, and generalize the actual facts of religion, whatever they may prove. And this kind of work it is that is making the "science of religion," its office being not to create—let me repeat—a new religion, but to trace the forces, laws, sequences, relations, that are exhibited in the phenomena of religious history and experience, to show the inner significance of the facts, and to track them back to their origin; and its probable result being, not a new basis for religion different from that which has always existed, but that religion will be authenticated as a natural and legitimate product of the human mind, and be shown to have a basis in human nature itself,—a basis which science will neither construct nor overthrow, but bring to light and vindicate.

In a word, the science of religion is simply the application of the scientific method to the subject of religion. Religion exists: that it exists as a fact, and has been one of the engrossing and dominant facts in human history, even the most rationalistic sceptic and disbeliever must admit; the science of religion is that classified knowledge of its facts which is gained by the method of observation, induction, deduction, and generalization. The science will doubtless modify beliefs about religion, and transform some religious conceptions; but it will not make religion itself, either in society or in individuals; at least, it can only act indirectly towards this end. The science may serve as a defence of religion against some antagonists; but for its sustenance religion must depend on the sources that have always fed it from the first appearance of man on the earth. The science reveals these sources, and says to materialistic doubters or to anxious believers: "Behold them there, not fatally implicated in the beliefs which historical criticism is resolving into legend and fable, but organically involved in the elemental and normal structure of human nature." The science, therefore, is merely confirmatory, while religion must continue as simple and as natural to humanity as ever, as organically original and aboriginal to human nature. Indeed, it is one of the facts that the science must note and explain, that some of the brightest examples of religion are not among the wise, the learned, the scientific, but among those whose sphere of knowledge may be very limited, and whose outward lot may be very narrow and hard, and who may not be able to give any philosophic account of that quality of faith and spirit which they daily exhibit in practice, but who, having simply the pure heart, and the single eye, and the love that is the fruitful seed of good actions, do somehow manifest that heroic devotion and fortitude and saintliness of virtue which the world calls religion. So far from having to wait for their religion, or for the fundamental elements of their religious beliefs, until the scientific scholars shall render their verdict, it is such people as these that give to the scholars a large part of the materials which their scientific eye is to arrange, and upon which a scientific verdict is to be rendered. Were there no religion except what the scientific students of religion were to produce, the science of religion would be very small; it would come, in fact, to an end, for the substance-matter with which it has to deal would be taken away.

Nevertheless, having made, as I trust, this distinction between "religion" and the "science of religion" clear, I hasten to say that the application of the scientific method to the subject of religion is to be of immense practical benefit. It is impossible that religion should exist without some thought concerning it—without some kind of attempt, rude or enlightened, to give a mental interpretation of its nature. This attempt is apparent among savage tribes, in whom the religious sentiment seems to have been just awakened, as well as among civilized and highly cultivated nations, where religion has had a long history. The barbarian worshipper of a fetish has some thought, some crude conception, about the significance of the fetish and of its relation to himself; that is, he has not only the religious sentiment, but he necessarily associates some belief with the sentiment; he has the beginning of a theology. And that the existence of religion should be accompanied by an effort of thought to explain it among an enlightened people is too patent a fact to require illustration. Now this thought about religion, this attempt to give a mental interpretation of it, which necessarily arises when man becomes conscious of the religious sentiment, is the source of the religious opinions, or of the theologies, which have attended the development of religion historically. The mythologies of ancient nations and of some barbarian races to-day are the theology of the people holding them; their attempt to give an intellectual explanation of religion, just as the Roman Catholic or the Calvinistic or the Universalist theology is an attempt to give such an explanation on the part of those who have a different mental culture, and may consider a different class of facts. And since the thought of mankind is constantly changing, since it has enlarged its limits and increased in accuracy as, historically, mankind have progressed in knowledge and culture in other directions, so the beliefs concerning religion, the theological conceptions and systems, the ecclesiastical forms and institutions, which have depended upon this thought, have also been subject to change—to growth and enlargement and reform,—taking shape according to the mental temperament and culture of the people and age that produced them. Among a people of metaphysical tendencies of mental temperament, or in an age characterized by metaphysical speculation, theology will assume a metaphysical character. If the imaginative and æsthetic faculties predominate, then religious thought will express itself more in art and sensuous form. If the logical understanding be the ruling tendency of thought, the theology of a people will shape itself accordingly into a syllogistical system.

Now ours is the age of science, the age of critical rational inquiry, and of the inductive method of thought. Theories in our time are to be brought to the test of observation and fact, and alleged facts are to be submitted to the keenest critical analysis. But religious thought has not yet in general been harmonized with this characteristic of the mental temper of the age. The theologies and ecclesiastical institutions of Christendom, with all their sectarian variety, are almost wholly the product of past ages, and of an entirely different intellectual temperament from that which now prevails. Some slight modifications have latterly been admitted in them, yet fundamentally, in respect, for instance, to conceptions of the nature of Deity and of his communication with man, in respect to revelation, inspiration, and the origin and support of genuine religion, they belong to the thought of a past epoch. And it will be the office of the scientific method applied to religion to effect the needed harmony between religious beliefs and modern thought; to infuse into men's thoughts about religion the new mental spirit of the time, and so to advance religious beliefs and institutions that they shall stand abreast with the most enlightened thought of the age in other directions of human activity. Thus will the science of religion do for this rationalistic and sceptical age an inestimable service; a service, as I believe, no less than that of substantiating this most important conclusion,—that the source, or seed, of religion is in the native constitution of the human mind, and that from this germinal source, inherent in human nature itself, has sprung by natural development and growth the whole history of religion, with all its varying beliefs, systems, rites, and worships, among mankind; and further, that this germinal source is of such a character, organically involved, as it may be shown to be, in the necessary relation between the finite mind and the entire conceivable and possible universe of being, that it can never cease to exist, nor ever be left behind as an outgrown faculty belonging only to the childhood of the race, nor its productiveness ever be exhausted.

But this service to be rendered by the application to religion of the scientific method will not be confined to the rationalistic and sceptical class. It will do for so-called religious "believers," or for the class of people who are members or supporters of churches, a service quite as valuable as it will render to the "sceptical" class who have openly broken with the popular forms of religious belief, and abandoned the churches. If it shall recall these latter to a recognition of some fundamental truth beneath the erroneous dogmas and the superstitious practices which they have discarded, it may serve to awaken in the former the equally important and practically more momentous recognition of the fact that the essential and primary truths of religion, so far from being necessarily involved in the acceptance of certain theological opinions, and the observance of certain ecclesiastical rites, actually require, from time to time, for their own healthy vitality and power, a change of religious beliefs and forms corresponding to the change in opinions and customs which the increasing culture of mankind is producing in other human interests. For if there is anything that is alarming in the religious condition of Christendom to-day, it is not so much the sceptical thought that is outside of the churches as it is the formalism prevailing in the churches. The dangerous symptom is to be found in the disposition, or the spiritual inertia rather, that adheres to traditional beliefs and ceremonies, which, though once, indeed, palpitating with the warm life-blood of the earnest faith and thought of the ages producing them, have long ceased to have any such vital relation to the generality of the minds now clinging to them, and yet are declared to be a necessary condition of present religiousness of spirit and life. In the time of Rome's decline it was not the rationalistic, sceptical attitude towards religious beliefs shown by such pure earnest-minded men as Lucretius that betokened the nation's disease. The alarming symptom was that, among the ruling and cultivated classes generally, outward conformity in religion had taken the place of genuine faith. When the Roman augurs on their official religious errands could not meet without laughing at each other behind their ecclesiastical sleeves for what they were doing, and yet kept on doing it, then, in that solemn farce, was not only the national religion, but, more than that, the national character, endangered. And whenever and however the vital connection between thought and faith is lost, and conformity to traditional creeds and usages is accepted as identical with religion, then is the cause of religion hurt and imperilled. If, therefore, the application of the scientific method to the subject of religion shall so separate the essential elements of religious faith from present accompaniments of doctrine and form as to show that, though the beliefs and forms may change and perish, religion may survive, and may develop other beliefs and institutions entirely in harmony with the rational thought of the present age—nay, that this change must come and will come in order that religion may survive and keep its power,—then, while great advantage would accrue to the unchurched rationalists, by disclosing the fact that they would no longer have a contest with religion, but could work in practical harmony with it, still greater and almost incalculable benefit would be rendered to the Church itself, by emancipating the religious sentiment, which is so largely embosomed in the Church, from bondage to the authority of tradition, and setting it free for a new creative period. It would be a great thing if the rationalistic mind of the age should come to see a deeper import in the fact of religion than it is now wont to see. But, because of the numbers, power, enthusiasm involved, it would be a greater thing if there should come a real revival of religion in the churches through a suddenly awakened recognition of the import of modern thought. This awakening, probably, will not come suddenly, but it must come in time as the natural result of wedding rational thought to religion. Let the tie that now joins the spirit of living faith to the dead body of ancient dogma be severed, and the religious sentiment will again be positively active, alive with all generous impulses towards human welfare, stimulating to noble endeavor for human improvement by the manifold new methods which this era of science has revealed, and producing, even to a finer symmetry in the ampler mental and moral spaces of this new time, the grand heroic characters and the gracious virtues which have marked the best periods of religious history in the past.

But how is it to be shown that the scientific method will legitimate religion to rational thought? I have been making statements for which perhaps proof may be required. Let us see, then, as briefly as we may, how the scientific method applied to religion operates; what results it has already achieved and is achieving, and what it foreshadows.

It should be said at the outset of this inquiry, that the science of religion—the phrase, I believe, was first used by Max Müller—differs very materially from theology,—at least as theology has usually been conceived and defined. Theology is the science, to use the common definition, "which treats of the existence, nature, and attributes of God." It begins, therefore, where the science of religion would naturally end, with the statement of principles; it begins and proceeds throughout by the à priori method; it takes little account of the facts of religious history; it assumes that to a portion of mankind the Supreme Power has miraculously revealed himself, and that all sure theological knowledge is contained within the limits of that revelation. But the science of religion begins with a thorough study of the facts in the religious history of man,—of all the facts concerned in the development of religion, and not in one or two nations only, but in the widest range of humanity, and through all grades of expression which the religious sentiment has taken. It thus makes of special account what is called comparative theology; and if one religion claims to have a kind of knowledge of Deity superior to and different from that possessed by any other religion, it is a claim that must be established, if at all, by this comparison of facts. The science of religion is thus inductive, empirical, not à priori; it begins and proceeds on the ground of solid facts; yet it is empirical (or experiential) in the sense of considering all the facts of religious experience and history; not simply outward events and tangible deeds, but facts of consciousness, of sentiment, aspiration, belief, hope, spiritual enthusiasm. Nothing in the whole field of religious history escapes its observation, or is deemed too small for its notice. Even beliefs that have proved to be fallacious and practices now counted as superstitions, legends, mythologies, stories of miracle, faiths that may seem to this age of culture only as the fairy tales of childhood—all come into the field of this science. Every opinion in religion that has been sincerely held, every crudest ceremony of worship that has attracted some earnest devotee, though he were the rudest savage of the primeval forest, has to the scientific student of religion a value, for the soul of truth or genuineness of feeling that was once in it. And through all these facts and phenomena of religious history and experience, the science of religion, by means of its scientific method of analysis, comparison, generalization, research into inner meanings, works its way to find the basis and root of religion. It begins with the observation of facts, it traces the mutual relations and significance of facts, and through the evidence of facts it establishes principles.

And from the application of this method to the study of religious phenomena, certain important points may be said to be already established, which we may venture to call the elementary principles of the science of religion.

1. The first of these points is the natural continuity of religious development. Not more unmistakably do the facts that are found in the strata of the earth, or in the strata of language, point to a natural continuity of the processes by which the earth has come to its present shape, and speech has developed its several varieties of language, than do the facts presented in the history of religion point to a natural continuity of that history. Even if one were to start with the presupposition that here and there the natural order of historical development had been broken by the interjection of miraculous power, the use of the scientific method would soon obliterate such presupposition, by showing it to be, if not unsupported by well authenticated facts, at least unnecessary to account for any facts. For it would discover that ideas and institutions which were supposed to be the product of a miraculously interposed revelation were in existence before the time of its alleged occurrence, and among races it is claimed not to have reached; so that either the miraculous revelation has been universal, embracing all mankind, or there has been none at all. But in either case, since the beginning of historical times there has been a natural continuity of religious development,—religions, races, and epochs being knit together in one organic process.

This natural continuity has multiform proofs, some of them very patent, some of them more subtile. In the clearer historical eras, we can trace it by the reappearance in later religions of beliefs and institutions that existed in the older religions from which they sprang; and also by that keener historical analysis which is now in vogue, and which brings to light, beneath the surface of events and the acts of great persons, those more secret but strong and persistent social elements and forces which enter by inheritance and from the general social atmosphere into the life of every age and people. In the dimmer ages of history, we can see that the natural relationship and continuity must have existed because of the sameness of ideas, ceremonies, institutions, legends, which are now found in widely separated nations and faiths; or, if there is no apparent historical connection, that at least these most likely are the product of the same natural continuity of development in one place, where we are not able to trace the lineage, as in another where we can trace it. This kind of research into ancient beliefs, showing how the features of old faiths that have otherwise become obsolete appear in the creeds and usages of people to-day, how even we of New England, and of this puritan city of Boston, are indebted for what we call our religion to many ancestral sources to be found in Greek and Roman and old German paganism, and even away back in ancient Egypt, and on the high plains of Bactria, as well as within Christian and Hebrew limits,—this is one of the present most fruitful fields of the science of religion; and a field that is furnishing beautiful testimony to the unbroken continuity of religious history, and to the fact that the human race is of one mental and spiritual stock. This research into the genealogy of religious beliefs, legends, and myths, enables us to trace religious continuity and kinship even into prehistoric times,—as does also that process which has been so largely depended upon in proving the continuity of lingual development; viz., the evolution of words having the same or similar meaning in different languages from the same primitive root. For instance, as Max Müller has pointed out, names representing the most important deities, and words standing for prayer, sacrifice, faith, law, spirit, altar, evidently coming from the same root and expressing similar ideas, are found in different and widely separated languages and religions, though the people using them had lost all historic trace of their common ancestry, and believed that they had religious ideas and customs peculiarly their own. The conclusion seems inevitable that here has been a continuity of religious belief as there has been of language. The Sanscrit Dyaus, Greek Zeus, Latin Jovis, German Tiu, all mean the sky, or the blue heavens. And Max Müller, after noting this relationship, says, summing up some of the finer lessons contained in this idea of the continuity of religious development:—

"These names are not mere names; they are historical facts, aye, facts more immediate, more trustworthy, than many facts of mediæval history. These words are not mere words, but they bring before us, with all vividness of an event which we witnessed ourselves but yesterday, the ancestors of the whole Aryan race, thousands of years, it may be, before Homer and the Veda, worshipping an unseen Being, under the self-same name, the best, the most exalted name they could find in their vocabulary,—under the name of the Light and Sky. And let us not turn away, and say that this was, after all, but Nature-worship and idolatry. No, it was not meant for that, though it may have been degraded into that in later times; Dyaus did not mean the blue sky merely, nor was it simply the blue sky personified; it was meant for something else. We have in the Veda the invocation, Dyaus-pitar, the Greek Zeu-pater, the Latin Jupiter; and that means in all three languages what it meant before those three languages were torn asunder; it means Heaven-Father! These two words are not mere words; they are to my mind the oldest poem, the oldest prayer, of mankind, or at least of that pure branch of it to which we belong,—and I am as firmly convinced that this prayer was uttered, that this name was given to the unknown God before Sanscrit was Sanscrit, and Greek was Greek, as, when I see the Lord's Prayer in the languages of Polynesia and Melanasia, I feel certain that it was first uttered in the language of Jerusalem."

2. And this quotation indicates a second point that is brought into relief when the scientific method is applied to the phenomena of religion; namely, the unity in essence that exists under the differing varieties of religious belief and form which the specific religions present. These deities in the different Aryan nations had come to be clothed with somewhat different attributes externally, but they were one in representing the idea of protecting fatherhood. And whether a specific religion develops into polytheism or keeps to a rigorous monotheism, a close analysis will make it evident that behind all conceptions of individual deities or deity, there is the apprehension of a Power, dimly felt, but unrepresented under any form whether of matter or of definite thought,—the uncaused Cause of things, sometimes conceived as fate, again more as providence, again as a mystery not to be known, but always as a power within and above all human destiny. What are popularly called the polytheistic and monotheistic religions are, indeed, not so different on account of the number of their deities as they are alike by reason of the sameness of the ideas which their deities represent. And the religions called monotheistic are not always strictly so. The Hebrews, from the evidence of the Old Testament itself, seemed to recognize the existence of other gods besides Jehovah; and we cannot call historical Christianity purely monotheistic, with its Trinity-dogma, with its God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, and its Virgin Mother of God, and its Satan so powerful as to secure eternal dominion over vastly the larger part of all the human race who have hitherto existed. If it be said that, in Christendom, the different divine personalities are conceived to be one in essence, so, it must be replied, out of Christendom faith points, though sometimes it may be more dimly, to a unity of divine essence behind the multiplicity of beings that are worshipped as divine. In India all deities were conceived as having their emanation from Brahm, the Supreme and Incomprehensible One; and in Greece the Olympian gods were bound by an oath to justice and virtue, implying a higher law than the will of individual deities, and a higher power that could depose and punish them. Even in the lowest forms of Nature-worship and Fetichism, we may detect the germs of a pure faith, as we may find the relics of Fetichism still existent in some religious customs counted Christian. As to doctrines, theological systems, ecclesiastical rites, various as these are in the different religions, yet an underlying unity is even here apparent. Incarnation, mediatorship, atonement, sacrifice, redemption—these are words of Christian theology; but the ideas are well-nigh universal, and these are corresponding words in the vocabulary of nearly all the historical religions. The cross, as a religious symbol, is found all round the globe, and in nearly all faiths, however ancient or modern. Baptism is an ancient religious rite belonging to many religions. So also is the ceremony of sacrifice, being equally at home in Judaism and India and ancient Rome, and to be witnessed as a survival to-day in the sacrificial relic of the Roman Catholic Mass. And if we can hear to-day in Christian churches vigorous exhortations against trusting to outward sacrifices and formal ceremonies for saving the soul, so could we have heard in India, a thousand years and more before the Christian era, the same exalted sentiments, setting forth the supreme virtue of spiritual worship and of pure deeds as against the mere external piety that adhered ostentatiously to letter and form. Or if morality in the different religions be compared, while we shall find great differences of social custom and a varying standard of ethics corresponding to different phases and grades of civilization, yet, beneath all standards and all variety of social usage, we shall be forced to recognize the sense of the binding obligation of virtue, and among all tolerably civilized nations, of whatever religious faith, essential unity, or at least progressive convergence towards unity, in the fundamental principles of the moral law.

3. A third point which emerges from the scientific study of religious phenomena is that religion, in all its varieties of form and belief, springs from one and the same primitive sentiment. What this sentiment is, the facts of the case, some of those already considered, and others which might be considered, also appear to indicate. Among the many definitions of religion which have been latterly given—all of them aiming at a broad scientific statement,—that of Mr. Picton, in his recent admirable book entitled The Mystery of Matter, seems to me to come nearest to the truth. He defines it as "an endeavor after a practical expression of man's conscious relation to the Infinite." But this needs, perhaps, when thus taken apart from his treatise, some explication. Let me say, then, trying closely to follow the indications of the phenomena of religion, that religion seems to me to have its germ in man's sense of his relation to the Infinite, which sense involves both a feeling of dependence and of practical obligation, and necessitates some mental conception of the relation. This statement embraces feeling, practice, and mental perception, or belief,—all of which enter as constituent elements into religion, historically at least, if not individually. But the point that most concerns us now is the first part of the statement only,—the germinal source from which religion first springs: and this I define to be man's sense of his relation to the Infinite. And this sense the facts seem to me to show to be common to all religions, and to be, indeed, universal to humanity, so far as we have any reliable records: not, of course, that the phrase, "The Infinite," is to be understood as referring distinctly to an individual or personal Deity, or to deities, or as embracing a definite conception of Supreme Being. With no such meaning of the phrase could the statement be substantiated by facts. But taking the term in its general and natural meaning, as suggesting indefinitely the sense of a Power in the universe, or above it, which is not man himself, but greater than man himself, and to which he stands in some vital relation, then the statement covers all grades and forms of religion from the lowest to the highest. How the Infinite shall be defined and apprehended will depend upon the faculties of mental perception and reason; and here differences will arise. But in the feeling which man has that there is this Infinite Somewhat, in which his existence and destiny are somehow involved—infinite to him because he cannot measure nor define nor bound it, and shading off into dimmest mystery, yet very real also to his consciousness—is the primal germ of religion. And a sense of relation to Infinite Being to this extent, I believe, must come into any complete definition of religion; and to this extent the sense, I think it may be shown, is actually found to be the germinal source of all special religions, and also to be a natural trait of humanity,—of humanity at least after it reaches a certain grade of intelligence.

Of course, in the lowest forms of religion this sense of the Infinite appears in very rude shape, and is associated with crudities of belief and practice which the cultivated mind pronounces most absurd. But there is no religion whatever, though it may be the most barbarous idolatry, which does not have within it this feeling after the Infinite,—this reaching out of the hands, as it were, to lay hold of some power dimly felt to exist at the centre of things, and to hold human destiny in its control. Even the dumb, black stone of Fetichism somehow represents to the worshipper who crouches before it the relation between his condition of existence and the great, mysterious existence outside of him, in which he lives and has his being. And when this worship ascends to the idolatry that adores the sun, the stars, the light, the blue dome of heaven, the adoring soul is still seeking, through a more intelligent act, to utter its sense of relation to this mighty, limitless whole that makes up the universe, and to the Power that in secret dwells within it and animates it. As intelligence increases, the Infinite is conceived to be more comprehensive, more of the great reality is grasped, thought concerning the relation becomes clearer, and the practical expression more rational; yet through all phases and varieties of religious faith, from the worship of idols up to the purest spiritual faith of Christendom, religion in its essence, at its heart, is conditioned on this sense of vital, practical relation between the finite soul and the Infinite Life. Even those materialistic rationalists who, identifying religion with the superstitious beliefs and practices which have attended it historically, are accustomed to deny that there is any religion that is true, and that there is any Supreme Being (by which they usually mean that there is no personal Deity), confess to this sense of a power within Nature that to them is infinite and beyond comprehension; or they say that Nature itself is the All that holds the mystery of being, to the laws of which they own they are bound in dependence and obligation. Buddhism is regarded by many as an atheistic religion. Yet Buddhism began in Buddha's baffled speculations on the mysteries of existence, from which he came back to rest in certain known principles of practical, individual, and social obligation,—a wholesome reaction against the excessive speculative philosophy and contemplative piety of Brahmanism. Yet through the whole history of Buddhism, in the background of the faith, has lain the great mystery still, never absent from the thought of the Buddhist teacher or from the feeling of the Buddhist worshipper,—a dim sense of Infinite Being before which the finite being must stand in the position of reverent silence. Much of the so-called atheism of our time is of similar attitude; it may deny the personality of the Power, may affirm the uselessness of trying to fathom the mystery, yet it recognizes the mystery, and seems to be drawn by a mental fascination to pry at the problems hidden within it. So the great atheistic poet of Rome, Lucretius, sung of "the eager valor of the soul, which longed first to break through the bars of Nature's gates." That eager valor, that longing of the human soul to break through the bars of the finite, that feeling that there is something there to break through into, something beyond our vision, beyond all our senses, beyond our knowledge and the utmost possible reach of our faculties, and yet something ever enfolding us, soliciting us, and closely related to us,—that is the religious sentiment. Even physical science recognizes this something in the infinitude of things which attracts the finite mind to exploration, and this power within the universe which is more than facts, more than the mere sequence of phenomena. Prof. Tyndall says: "The scientific mind can find no repose in the mere registration of sequence in Nature; the further question intrudes itself with resistless might, Whence comes the sequence?" and he adds that to find "permanence of power" under changeful appearances has been the highest inspiration of science. Physical science does not profess to comprehend this power; it owns it in its nature to be a mystery, yet confesses its existence. It may call it force, energy, law, but is it not naming the same power which religion has called Brahm, Jehovah, or Zeus, Divinity, Deity, God? And in its doctrine of the conservation, or persistence, of force, physical science now distinctly recognizes the unity and abidingness of this power,—recognizes it as something which, through all varieties and phases of force-manifestation, and all kinds of phenomena, remains one, unchanged and perpetual. And what is this but to put into scientific language what the religious spirit uttered in poetic phrase so grandly three thousand years ago? "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old as a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end."

Religion and science then alike, the devout sentiment and the logical understanding, theism and so-called atheism, all equally recognize the existence of a permanent power under changeful phenomena. All classes and grades of human beings confess their relation to this power, and give to it their expressed or silent homage. The veriest inanimate matter cannot escape this secret energy which possesses and shapes and works through all things. Dispelled in one form, and seemingly annihilated, it reappears in another. Microscope and telescope and spectroscope do not resolve its mystery, but only reveal its wondrous nature the more, and almost prove its omnipresence. And as to the human consciousness, it is not the imaginative faculty merely, but the most empirical logic, that is compelled to exclaim before this marvellous operator, "Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" From this sense of relation to the Infinite, man cannot escape.

4. Now if the science of religion establishes, by the evidence of religious phenomena, these three points,—the natural continuity of religious development, the unity in essence of the various forms of religion, and the human sense of relation to the Infinite as the germinal source of religion, then it is in position to establish a fourth point; viz., that the religious sentiment is organically inherent in the human mind, and that religion therefore is a permanent and indestructible product in the historical development of the human race. Let this point be established, and all disturbing apprehensions as to the fate of religion in the future may be dismissed. Whatever changes may be wrought in the phenomenal beliefs and institutions of religious history, the root of religious faith will survive, and may be trusted to retain its vitality. But in order to establish this point, the nature of the faith involved in man's sense of his relation to the Infinite must be examined. This sense may seem a very simple one, and by many persons it would be regarded as sufficiently indicating in itself its own natural permanence. But it is susceptible of analysis, and this analysis is perhaps necessary for positively substantiating the proposition that the germ of religion is indestructibly inherent in the organic structure of human nature. The question we are to ask, therefore, is, What is the nature of the faith involved in this sense of human relation to the Infinite?

Faith is a word of larger import than religion. By a generic use of the word, we may say that we have faith in our physical senses,—that is, we accept their reports of the outer world to consciousness as trustworthy. But this is not a very strict use of the word, and may tend to increase the popular theological confusion between faith and sight. It is certain, too, that impressions first received from the senses are often delusions; as when a child reaches after a remote object which his eye tells him is close at hand. Here the first sense-impression is not trustworthy, and it is only after many experiments that a sure reliance on the reports of the vision is created. This use of the word, however, if proper discriminations be made, may help us to understand the essence of faith in its stricter sense. What the mind really does, when it first receives an impression through the senses from the outward world, is to accept the impression as representing a genuine reality. In respect to the conditions, form, relations to other objects, of that reality, it may be mistaken; and on these points correction may have to be made by experience and reason. But that disposition inherent in the mind to accept the report of the external senses as standing for some reality,—that native and necessary disposition to trust the working of these faculties, which connect us with the external world, as no delusion and cheat, but as a real and genuine transaction,—this is the essence of faith; and further, when there has been some mistake in the first sense-impressions as to the conditions of this reality, that disposition, which is also necessarily inherent in the human mind, to accept the testimony of experience and reason as worthy to be trusted in correcting these impressions,—this also is of the essence of faith. So that, concerning the relations of our consciousness to the material world, we might define faith as that native and necessary confidence which the human mind has that its own faculties, whether of external sense or of comparison of repeated observations (which is the meaning of experience), or of reasoning, are no impostors, but are genuine and trustworthy. Without this trust in its own natural faculties and functions, we pronounce a mind insane. In this sense of the word, faith is the condition of mental sanity. The sane mind necessarily accepts the veracity of its own faculties, and therefore confides in the reality of the external world which they report.

This definition will at least serve to illustrate the meaning of faith when applied to its more special field,—that of the inner consciousness. Here, too, we may say that faith is that native and inherent confidence which the human mind has in the genuineness of its own natural faculties,—that feeling which it cannot escape so long as it is sanely conscious, that it is not a victim of deception and illusion, but that certain mental impressions of which it is conscious, certain natural tendencies and impulses that seem to be native to consciousness itself, represent actual realities; not that these mental impressions, if we mean by them ideas, are to be declared innate, but that they certainly appear in the consciousness as man develops and expands under the experience of life. The mind finds in itself, for instance, the sense of truth, the sense of right, the sense of goodness, the sense of duty, the sense of harmony, proportion, and beauty; and, let the theory of the origin of these inner senses be what it may, the mind cannot help but put trust in them, and accept them as representative of actual distinctions existing in the very nature of things. And this trust—this natural and unquestioning reliance of the mind upon the veracity of its own inward faculties, this necessary acceptance of the sincerity of its own natural operations,—this it is that is of the essence of faith. It is to be observed, too, that the mind, in this inner sense which it has of truth, right, goodness, beauty, makes a distinction between a perception of what is true or good or beautiful and what is actually so. This distinction may be learned by experience or by the exercise of thought, just as the child learns to correct the first sense-impressions of the distance of an external object by a comparison of subsequent impressions; but when the distinction is learned, then it is immediately applied, the mind instinctively giving its allegiance, not to the old perception which is discarded, but to the reality which it was assumed to represent, and hence to the newer and corrected perception as a more authentic representative of that reality. That is, faith is the human mind's acceptance of the veracity of all its faculties,—not of its faculties of feeling, of inner tendency and sentiment only, but of its faculties of reasoning and judgment, and of reasoning and judgment working upon facts of observation and knowledge. So that it is not true that faith and knowledge, though different, are antagonistic or inconsistent elements of character, the one, as it is the custom to say, beginning where the other comes to an end; but both may exist together; nay, faith is a necessary condition of all knowledge, and knowledge is necessary for furnishing faith with its working materials.

But we are still considering faith in a somewhat generic sense. Let us now take another step, and see if we can find, from the ground of this general sense, the more special meaning of the phrase religious faith. Let us ask the question, Whence comes this natural allegiance of the human mind to what it conceives to be true or good or beautiful, or this trust that these ideas, though associated practically with imperfect perceptions, yet are representative of absolute realities? We may best reach the answer, perhaps, by an illustration. Every organic existence, animate or inanimate, is subject to an inward formative principle, which gives, we may say, the law of its being. Thus, take a crystal: it is not formed haphazard, but always in the same way, always by a certain method, always by fixed mathematical proportions. There is some kind of organizing principle within the atoms composing it which makes it a crystal and not something else; a power in addition to the attracting force by which the particles are drawn together, for it is a power guiding the attracting force to a certain definite result. Or, take any kind of vegetable organism: the seed from which it springs contains, besides the materials out of which the new germ is to begin its structure, something, though we know not what, that controls and shapes those materials, and other constituent materials which are to be assimilated from the surrounding earth and air and light, so that they come to a certain product, each seed producing tree or plant after its kind, and each and every organism, through this constructive principle, being brought into a system of reciprocal relations with the surrounding world. The same thing is true in the development of animal organisms. Nor does it make any difference, in the use to which I am now to put this illustration, how these distinct types of organic existence first originated. They may have come by a process of gradual differentiation and evolution from some common ancestral germ. Nevertheless, each kind of germ, however outwardly undistinguishable from any other, is shaped in its development, by some inherent principle of organization, into a certain type. And it is to be affirmed, too, that the theory of evolution of all types from a common germinal substance equally implies an evolving principle, a guiding agency, within the chaotic matter which is thus gradually shaped into manifold forms of organic existence and life; and also that there is some kind of power within these various separate forms of existence by which they continue to be related to each other, and each to the whole. Every part of existence is linked by this inner force to every other. And the latest scientific researches seem to indicate that even the infinitesimal atoms of matter are but centres of force, through which all parts of the universe are co-related and act and react upon each other.

Now in the mind of man this formative principle, this guiding force, becomes self-conscious. Man is capable of reflection upon his own conduct; capable of apprehending and controlling to a degree his own condition and destiny. He sees that into which the inward principle, or law, of his being would fashion him, and is gifted with the power to act with this principle, or to resist and violate it. Yet even when violating, he is compelled to recognize that he owes allegiance to it,—compelled by the very constitution of his being to confess that he ought to follow this inward formative principle of which he is conscious, just as the crystal, or the tree, unconsciously obeys and is shaped by the guiding force inherent in its organism. Heeding this guiding principle, his character is shaped into a certain symmetry known as virtue, and his life is put into mutual relations of dependence, sympathy, and helpfulness with the lives of other human beings. And the dispositions and deeds into which this principle would organize his character he necessarily recognizes as right, their opposites as wrong; and further, that this distinction is no delusion, but a genuine reality. Hence we have now, through this illustration, reached the meaning of faith in its moral significance. It is conscious loyalty to an inward formative principle of character, which is conceived as having an inherent right to direct human action.

Now take one step further, by an analysis of this definition of moral faith, and we have religious faith. It is already implied in the moral, but the implication is not always evident, nor always consciously admitted. Yet in essence it is there. For what is this inward formative principle to which the human mind confesses its loyalty? this directive agency, which is self-conscious in man, and associated with his own volition as an element in his action, but which also appears as unconscious force, or law, in every kind of organized existence below man,—this something which is not organism, but a shaping power within every species of organism,—this something that must have been involved in the very first movement of evolution from chaos towards cosmos? Have we not come back again to that agency within phenomena which natural science calls energy, force, law, and which religious science calls the Infinite? to that persistent, abiding power which survives unchanged and indestructible amidst the manifold appearings and vanishings of the material forms that make up the visible universe? to that power which, even in the view of physical science, has neither beginning, nor end, nor fathomableness, but has its being in the infinite mystery of things? to that power which even religion, though seeking to fathom, and feeling to be very real and near, has confessed to be, in its entirety, "past finding out," and to which, with a sense of the helplessness of words before the infinite mystery, it has given the names Omnipotence, Omnipresence, Great First Cause, Eternal Goodness, Almighty Sovereignty, Being that Was and Is and is to Come? And if we connect this Force, this persistent, ever-present Energy, which natural science indicates as the unitary and animating principle of the universe—if we connect this, or, according to the scientific doctrine of the correlation of forces, identify it, rather, as we may, with that inward formative principle of character of which we are conscious in our own natures, and to which we cannot help but give our loyal adhesion, then we have religious faith,—a faith not simply mental or moral, but religious: religious, because it accepts that inherent, formative principle of character as in some way having its source in the Infinite Power that is made manifest in the universe, and as in some way relating us to the Infinite Life of the universe as constituent parts thereof; religious faith, because this sense of the Infinite, like the outward senses, is necessarily accepted as trustworthy,—as being no delusion and deception, but as representing the highest possible Reality of things; that Reality which makes truth to be truth, and right to be right, and love to be love, and beauty beauty; that Reality which is felt to be the primal cause, central sustenance, pervading energy and purpose of all that is—the eternal in the transient, the One in the all; and religious faith, again, because the sense of obligation which it involves connects our individual characters and conduct in relations of duty to other individuals and to the All, and to the Unity that makes the all into an organic Whole; religious faith, because the moral law is seen to mark the line of true proportion between individual action and the structure of Universal Being, and every pure impulse of love and beneficence is felt to be the organic pulsation in our finite natures of an aim that throbs throughout the universe.

We now see why it is that our natures are compelled to confess their loyalty to truth and right and goodness; why it is that the way of virtue attracts, though it be the more difficult, and that of vice, though followed, brings not peace but self-reproaches and pain; why it is that, though passion may incite to malice and evil-doing towards another, something in the soul whispers of love and forgiveness as higher and more admirable impulses. It is because this formative principle within our natures is identical with the central, animating energy and aim of the universe itself. That persistent Power becoming self-conscious in us, it informs us of its own attributes and purposes. We bend in loyalty and homage to truth, because this guiding force within us is itself part and parcel of the central reality of things, and bends us with its own gravity. We have to confess our allegiance to the law of right, to the demands of love, to the hard, heroic choice of virtue rather than a life of self-indulgent ease, because this persistent energy within the universe, which has become a formative principle of character in us, is indeed "the Power that makes for righteousness,"—and it comes into us bringing the aim and drift of its own energies, and so pushes us by inward impulse to the fulfilment of its tasks. Though it may take centuries and ages of hard experience to develop the human race into this condition of conscious cooperation, yet in the lapse of time the race does learn that it must "do justly and love mercy;" and learns it because that guiding Power within us which gives an aim and goal for our conduct, and with which we are to "walk humbly" day by day, is the same Power that makes justice and love to be the goal towards which all things in the universe are moving. In our sense of the Infinite, therefore, not only is the sense of power involved, but the sense of a mental and moral self-consistency at the heart of the universe. And this is the essence of religious faith.

It seems clear, then, to sum up in conclusion the results of this course of thought, that religious faith does not exist at the sufferance of opinion, or of theory, or by the authority of any one of the special religions, but has its existence by virtue of the organic structure of the human mind, and must continue so long as the human mind remains what it is. While scientific philosophy may authenticate and justify its existence, religion does not wait for the decisions of scientific more than of ecclesiastic councils for leave to be. Religious beliefs and theories and institutions, which are the result of changing and advancing human thought, may come and go. The special religions, having a historical beginning and career, may have a historical dissolution; but the faith which is their root is as indestructible as human nature itself. Faith is the ceaseless, persistent energy of religious history. Beliefs, institutions, theological theories, ecclesiastical forms of worship, are the varying phenomena which this spiritual energy assumes. Religion springs from man's natural feeling of the Infinite; but the history of religion is the result of thought seeking a practical and mental expression of this sentiment. As thought changes, develops, grows, the history must inevitably change; but the source in the human mind remains, permanent and ineradicable.

And even the essential primary elements of all the great religious beliefs remain. Changing thought may change the form, but the substance stays. Belief in an individual Deity, who is only one among the existences of the universe, may pass away,—just as belief in individual deities has already vanished from enlightened minds; but belief in a Power that is one with the universe, the unity of its manifoldness, the nisus of Nature, the inspiration of consciousness,—this is a faith that is inherent in the natural constitution of the human mind, and stays. Belief in divine Providence as a special agency of intervention for extricating human beings from the difficult straits of life—perhaps from critical emergencies which may be the result of their own ignorance or folly—may pass away; but belief in a Providence which means that an intelligent aim and a wise, forecasting goodness are inwrought into the very substance of the life in which we all share, and work out their results largely through the active sympathies, knowledge, and skill of human beings,—a Providence not fitful, not intermittent, but to be depended upon by all mankind for the daily bounty that sends rain and sunshine on good and evil alike, and supplies life's table with all the hospitalities of Nature, material and mental,—belief in such a Providence stays, and is every day made clearer by a scientific study of both Nature and man. The great sanctities of moral obligation, let scientific analysis explain them as it will, remain untouched, science only showing them the more inextricably woven into the very substance of human consciousness and experience. Even the hope and conviction of immortality, since they are already here, will stay, till scientific thought can disprove their right to be; with even this possible added confirmation from physical science, that no Force is ever lost out of existence, and personality, the crown of all forces, is not unlikely to be proved as inextinguishable as the hope of personal continuance seems unquenchable. And as to prayer—at least in the sense of aspiration to be at one with the persistent Power "that makes for righteousness,"—yearning after goodness, inward communion with holy thoughts, consecration of heart and soul to noble purposes and noble work,—can these, however much form and words and externality may change,—can these in essence ever be lost, so long as man continues to live with this sense of being embosomed in the Infinite, feeling constantly, as he must, his dependence, its impartation, and its fascinating secret ever inviting him to deeper exploration, and ever soliciting him to give of it a finer and nobler expression in his own life? Having the soul of man, with its "eager valor," with all its manifold longings to search and sound and do, and having the Infinite inviting the search and rewarding the valor, have we not all? A foundation that is sure, and promise of a structure that shall be indestructible.

EDUCATION AT THE SOUTH.—From the last census it appears there were in 1870, in all the States of the Union, 4,438,206 persons ten years of age and upwards unable to read. This is a startling exhibit of illiteracy for a country boasting of free schools and universal education; but when we come to examine the figures more in detail, they are robbed of much of their significance. In the sixteen States of Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, comprising the former area of slave territory, the census-takers found 3,550,424 of these illiterate persons. There were consequently only 887,782 to be found in all the remainder of the country. It must also be remembered that of the total population of 38,115,641 in all the States, these sixteen States contained only 13,347,614. It can hardly be necessary to comment on these figures. A population of 24,768,027, blessed with all the advantages of free public schools, had only 887,782 illiterate persons, while a population of 13,347,614, deprived of these advantages, had 3,550,424 such persons. This comparison tells the whole story.—Exchange.

AN AMUSING story of the Confessional is told by the rural Chroniqueur of the Temps. A priest rather fond of good fare had received a present of a snipe. M. le Curé superintended the cooking of the delicacy himself, and was just about to sit down to it when a call from a parishioner compelled him to leave the room for a minute. When he came back the snipe had disappeared, and the cook testified to having seen the cat bolt with it. History does not say whether the thief was excommunicated like the jackdaw of Rheims, but at Easter, when all the village came to confess their sins since Christmas, Catherine the cook, came also. After running through the usual list of peccadilloes, she suddenly stopped. "Well; make haste," said the Curé; "what more?" "Does your reverence remember the stolen snipe?" asked Catherine. "Rather," was the irritable reply, "the one that brigand de chat ran away with." "I was the cat," murmured the penitent. "You ate it?" was asked in a tone of intense bitterness. "Yes." "How?" "Cold." "What, malheureuse! You, a cordon bleu, eat a cold snipe when it was so easy to make it into a salnie? Catherine, I decidedly refuse absolution to you."—London Graphic.

JOAQUIN MILLER has conquered the pride of Englishmen by showing them even a greater pride than theirs; and his attractiveness in English society is said to be in exact proportion to his contempt for it. And if Americans are at all like Britons, they, too, will become great admirers of Mr. Miller, for they seem to be greatly scorned by him. Recently, as he himself relates, being in Geneva, he found the town too full of his countrymen; and to relieve himself of their presence he drove to the nearest boat and went on board. Soon the clerk came by and asked him where he would be pleased to go. The poet replied: "Monsieur, take me to some little place where there are no Americans." The clerk looked at him for a moment, then hopelessly up and down the lake, and away across toward Mont Blanc, and at last shook his head. Suddenly a new idea seemed to strike him, and he lifted his eyes toward heaven!—Christian Union.

Poetry.

TRUE BLESSEDNESS.

It is not blessedness to know that thou thyself art blessed,
True joy was never yet by one, nor yet by two, possessed.

Nor to the many is it given, but only to the all;
The joy that leaves one heart unblessed would be for mine too small.

For when my spirit once was blessed, to know another grieved
Would take away the joy from all that I myself received.

Nor would I seek to blunt that pain, forgetting others' woe;
From knowledge, not from want of thought, true blessedness must grow.

For blessedness I find this earth of ours is then no place,
Where still the happiest man must meet his brother's grieving face.

And only in one thought I find the joy I never miss,
In faith to know all grief below will grow to final bliss.

And he who holds this faith will strive with firm and ardent soul,
And work out his own proper good in working for the whole.

God only sees this perfect good, the way to it is dim;
God only, then, is truly blest, man only blest in him.

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up 4,254 names; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 8,553.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" against non-taxation of church property have been received since last week as follows: From Joseph Barnes, Junius, New York, 46; from Edson Hannum, Southampton, Massachusetts, 17. Total for the week—63.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" against non-taxation of church property have been received as follows since last week: From J. Mark Winslow, Wakefield, 145; from the Boston Investigator, 23; from E. Z. Stevens, Cambridgeport, 35; from Edson Hannum, Southampton, 16; from George W. Keyes, Newton, 14; from Gilbert Billings, Chicopee, 50. Total for the week—283.

The typographical error of "claquerors" for "claqueurs," at the close of Mr. Frothingham's article last week, is too gross to be tolerated without correction. We hope our French-reading subscribers will not overwhelm us with a flood of lexicons. That it escaped observation is mortifying enough; but Mr. Frothingham is not to be charged with attempting what is impossible to kings—"inventing a word."

This notice arrived too late for insertion in last week's issue: "The Free Congregational Society of Florence will dedicate their new building, Cosmian Hall, Wednesday evening, March 25, and Thursday 26. Addresses will be given by Charles C. Burleigh, Frederick Douglass, F. E. Abbot, William J. Potter, A. B. Alcott, Mrs. N. T. Brigham, S. H. Morse, Giles Stebbins, Rowland Connor, A. T. Lilly, and probably, also, by O. B. Frothingham, Horace Seaver, Samuel Johnson, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and others. Letters will be read from Theodore D. Weld, Parker Pillsbury, Lucy Stone, Celia Burleigh, T. W. Higginson, and others. The prospect is good for a pleasant and somewhat unique occasion."

A "Philosophical Society" has been formed in Chicago, the objects of which "shall be the mutual improvement of its members and the general diffusion of knowledge, by considering, in the interests of Truth, the following subjects: questions of Moral Philosophy, Social Science, Natural Science, Speculative Philosophy, the more important Events of Current History." Professor Joseph E. Haven is the President; and among the names of the Vice-Presidents are those of Rev. Robert Collyer, Hon. Julius Rosenthal, and Rabbi Bernhard Felsenthal. The Preamble is as follows: "Being profoundly impressed with the Unity of Truth, in its origin as well as its infinite value to man, and being equally impressed with the blinding effects upon the human mind of Ignorance, Prejudice, and Superstition, it has seemed desirable to us (believing the time for such a movement has arrived) to seek the organization of a society whose sole motto shall be 'What is Truth?' whose members, regardless of past associations, preconceived opinions or expressed convictions, shall in a spirit of simplicity and candor associate for the investigation of questions that are peculiar to our time, pertaining to human welfare." The conditions of membership are simply these: "Membership shall include all persons who feel an interest in the objects of the Society, and who shall comply with its Constitution and By-Laws." We desire to express our heartiest and most unqualified sympathy with the objects and apparent spirit of such an organization as this.

"BREADTH."

It has been said that The Index does not represent the real breadth of free religion,—that it is not in the truest sense an organ of the free religious movement, but rather of individual convictions which constitute merely one phase of it,—that it lacks the comprehensiveness and catholicity of sympathy, and the freedom from a pronounced prevailing tone, which should characterize an organ of this movement in all its broad inclusiveness. If we correctly conceive the meaning of this criticism, illustrations of the defect referred to may be found in the positions that Christianity is necessarily hostile to liberty, and that intuitionalism is an imperfect form of free religion as compared with the scientific form of it. Such definite positions, it is thought, are merely individual, and not shared by many of those who are actively interested in the free religious movement; and the want of sympathy they seem to imply with the liberal wings of various Christian denominations, and with various classes of radicals, renders the paper a very inadequate exponent of the real tendencies and spirit of free religion.

These criticisms are entitled to most respectful consideration.

In the first place, it may be questioned whether any organ of the free religious movement is possible in the sense desired. A paper might be supported for a while by the contributions of many minds, without having any convictions of its own, and therefore devoid of any prevailing bias, under the direction of a mere "managing editor;" but it is at least a question whether it would possess sufficient vitality or character to give it any strong hold upon its constituency. We suspect that it would exercise practically a very feeble influence on public opinion—too feeble to do efficient service of any sort. If, however, a man of powerful intellect, strong character, and concentrated purpose should be selected to edit the desired organ, in order to give it weight and influence with the community, then it would soon be found that his individuality would give it a prevailing bias in some direction or other, and defeat the wish of those who wanted an organ independent of any individual's limitations. The presence of any definite convictions, giving shape to the general editorial conduct of the paper, though without in any degree limiting the freedom of utterance possessed by all who contributed to its columns, would be found to produce the same result now regretted by some in the case of The Index. The possibilities would seem to be narrowed down to a choice between two things: either to have a bloodless organ uttering the diverse opinions of all without emphasizing any, or to have a live one emphasizing its own, while giving free utterance to every other. The former would seem to be even less an organ of the free religious movement than the latter; for, however faithfully it might represent the diversity of this movement, it would totally fail to represent the unity of it. Whether the journal with convictions of its own should truly represent this unity, or not, would depend wholly on their intrinsic truth; and this must be the real question, after all. If the ideas that gave a specific direction and color to the course of such a journal should really contain the life of the free religious movement,—should really constitute the power, spirit, and tendency of it,—then the journal would represent this movement in the highest, truest, and broadest way, even if some of the countless shades of opinion among radicals did not get themselves stated in full in its columns.

A distinction must be drawn in this matter between the Free Religious Association, the free religious movement, and free religion itself.

It is now well understood, we suppose, that The Index is not, and never has been, the official organ of the Free Religious Association as such. Yet the President, Secretary, and other officers and members of it, have written and still write in The Index with absolute freedom. They are all as safe from revision or supervision in their utterances as we are; and this they all know. So far, therefore, as these writers in their individual capacity represent the Free Religious Association, so far The Index represents it.

The free religious movement, however, includes many persons who have never joined the Association. Many of them write for The Index occasionally, and others do not. It is to be taken for granted that some of the latter may fail to find their own precise shades of belief represented in the paper. Who is to blame for this (if any body)? The Index, or they? No one has ever had occasion to complain that an able, well-written article was refused insertion because of any difference of opinion between the writer and the editor. On the contrary, articles expressing dissent from our own views have always been invited and welcomed. If The Index, then, has failed to represent the views of some who have taken part in the free religious movement, it must be because they have chosen not to represent themselves, and not at all because the paper has not been always ready to represent them. We have always been desirous, nay, solicitous, to secure expression in these columns of the most diverse views; but we have not felt obliged on this account to withhold expression of our own, and no one who believes in real freedom can ever have desired that we should. If any one thinks that The Index fails to represent fairly and fully his own individual views of free religion, he is alone responsible for the fact; these pages are always at his service, provided he can write with a reasonable degree of skill. The widest range of thought and belief has, in reality, always been a marked characteristic of this journal. So far, therefore, as the free religious movement is able or willing to represent itself, The Index represents it.

But besides the Free Religious Association and the free religious movement, there is free religion itself. It is this to which The Index has been devoted from the start; and this we believe it represents, fully and fairly, in all its breadth,—breadth of principle and breadth of sympathy. Absolute freedom of thought, unlimited by any reservation,—absolute catholicity of fellowship, unlimited by any barrier of creed, color, or sex,—absolute fulness of aspiration and effort after the ideal life, with all it includes and leads to, unlimited by any compromise or concession to lower aims: let him who can name broader principles than these. While The Index has never been the organ of any association or party or individual, it has always been an organ of these ideas, with sincerest sympathy for all who hold them, and in proportion to the universality with which they hold them. It has never had, or pretended to have, any sympathy at all for limitations of these ideas; the integrity of free religion itself forbids that. To sympathize with such limitations would be to betray want of sympathy for the unlimited ideas which are the essential life of free religion.

But, even while pointing out with unsparing directness the mischief of all limitations of these ideas, and explicitly disclaiming sympathy for every form of religious belief, organized or unorganized, which limits them, The Index has been full of sympathy for all men and all women, in virtue of the very humanity which their religious beliefs so often crucify and deny. Sects, sectarians, and sectarianism, as such, it has faithfully opposed; but the humanity which sectarianism itself can never succeed in wholly suppressing or imprisoning, and which makes sectarians themselves members of our common race, it has always loved, honored, and defended. This point ought, surely, to be well understood. The Index has had no sympathy with the sects, as such; but for all the men and women who compose the sects it has had, and will ever have, the warmest and truest sympathy, because sectarianism is not the men and women themselves, but merely the straight-jacket they wear. To strive to free them from this straight-jacket,—to seek to emancipate and enfranchise the slaves of creeds and ecclesiastical superstitions,—is to show the tenderest sympathy for the humanity thus cruelly outraged and wronged. It is a false and narrow sympathy which forbears to touch these chains because the chained are used to them and cherish them,—a false and narrow sympathy which thus paralyzes the arm of deliverance, and sheathes the sword of truth. The true breadth of free religion is not to be found in a superficial inclusiveness, which would fain embrace in one brotherhood those who are eternally parted so long as superstition and sectarianism survive. Spiritual fellowship has its laws and its conditions. It cannot be attained while the limitations of freedom which destroy it are suffered to steel the sectarian's heart against the natural impulses of humanity. The tenderness which moves not a few noble spirits to leave these limitations untouched, lest those who believe in them be grieved or wounded for a time, defeats its own object, and postpones indefinitely the foundation of the only possible "fellowship in the spirit." Such a fellowship must rest on the unlimited ideas of free religion; and that sympathy alone is truly broad which tells the plain truth plainly,—which shows that Christianity and intuitionalism limit freedom of the mind, and prevent the formation of that universal brotherhood which must rest on freedom itself.

The genuine breadth of free religion, therefore, requires that there shall be no feebleness, or vacillation, or suppression of the truth. Sympathy of the broadest kind is indeed demanded; but it must be faithful and brave, as well as tender. It must not flinch to show the impossibility of fellowship until freedom is accomplished. It must plant itself on universal ideas, and refuse for an instant to consent to their limitations. It must concede nothing to superstitious reverence for names or to shrinking dread of the full daylight of science. It must thus show itself bold as well as sweet, strong as well as quick, high-minded as well as tender-hearted. The sympathy which withholds the uncompromising truth is false, and not true,—narrow, and not broad.

This is the breadth of principle and of sympathy which constitutes the soul of free religion; and this THE INDEX, however inadequately, represents. No matter whether associations and movements represent it in all its fulness or not, this is the broad, inclusive, universal truth that THE INDEX was founded to tell, to toil for, and to defend. The exceeding breadth of it seems narrowness to some only because it is imperfectly comprehended; the plainness of speech it requires seems harshness to some only because its spirit is very poorly appreciated. But from the verdict of to-day THE INDEX appeals to that of generations yet to come. The convictions it stands for are not those of any individual, but rather of the enlightened human mind; and what it most truly represents is not associations or movements, but the free religion out of which associations and movements are born. THE INDEX points to that; and by it alone must it be judged at last.

AN OPEN LETTER.

DEAR INDEX:—

The daily papers have a habit of glorifying themselves, which you will never imitate, and which no self-respecting man would encourage. But a paper may suffer through the failure of the public to appreciate its character, and this ought not to be allowed. Such is the case with THE INDEX; and if you will permit me, I should like to say something to your readers about yourself. Complaints of THE INDEX show that the position of the paper is not understood. People ask why THE INDEX is not more various; why it is not more entertaining; why it has nothing for children; why it addresses so limited a class; why it contains so many heavy letters. To these we say that:—

1. THE INDEX is not a newspaper, and cannot do the work of a newspaper.

2. It is not a political paper, and must therefore lack the spirit, the snap, the popular attractiveness of a political paper. It does not meet people on the plane of an absorbing practical interest, and cannot therefore claim support as if it did.

3. It is not a family paper, which floats a tiny ark of ideas over an ocean of nursery stories. Ideas are its ocean, and the nursery stories that will float on it are not yet made. Children do not bathe in those waters.

4. It is not a sectarian paper, the organ of a party or denomination, and consequently has no clerical gossip, no reports of conventions, no parish news, no missionary letters, no succulent statistics of denominational increase so luscious to the sectarian palate. Every sectarian paper has the patronage of its sect. Leaders of the sect raise money for it; ministers of the sect write for it, assist its editors, take the editor's chair on an emergency. THE INDEX has none of these advantages. The editor has no denominational padding, no clerical sympathy or aid. The scissors serve him little. He must fill his sheet with solid material, and depend on his ability to interest thinkers. His pecuniary resources are drawn from a limited class, proverbially poor and usually overworked, who have, or desire to have, convictions. Having no money, he cannot buy the pens of eminent men who must sell, and cannot afford to give, their work; having no ecclesiastical position, he cannot command them. A paper like THE INDEX asks nothing from the community at large. Its claim is solely on the friends of honest thought.

Has THE INDEX fairly a claim on these? Surely it has. Not by the sacrifices that have been made to sustain it, for, if sacrifices are misbestowed, they amount to nothing; but by the intellectual attitude it takes, and its faithfulness to it; by its clearness, sincerity, and courage. I read THE INDEX from week to week with wonder at the amount of intellectual nutriment it contains. No religious weekly in the country, not the Independent, not the Christian Union, has so much strong, earnest, independent thinking on the deepest problems of mind. The essays and lectures that are printed there are alone sufficient to distinguish it from its contemporaries. The discussions of living themes are always conducted on the highest level, and are always suggestive. The published letters come from full minds and stout hearts. The habit of allowing different sides to be heard, the disclaimer of infallibility, commends it to the friends of candor; and its passionate loyalty to truth, irrespective of consequences, gives it preëminence over the best paper which is committed to a system. As I understand it, THE INDEX aspires to be an educator, and not, for any cause, an apologist.

That such a paper should lack a large popular support is not surprising, for reasons given above. Its constituency is, of necessity, very small. All the more is it incumbent on its members to make effort in its behalf. The reputation for meanness and carelessness that the radicals have is not wholly deserved, for they are few, and, as a rule, poor; their radicalism often needs filtering into clear conviction; it is half-minded and half-hearted; either they have not arrived at positive beliefs, or they have not felt their importance. But neither is the reputation wholly undeserved. They do not, probably, except in rare cases, give all they ought. They have not the spirit of consecration which is required in all new causes. They cavil too much and combine too little. They are better critics than coadjutors. It certainly would be no hard thing to sustain a weekly paper like THE INDEX in a style worthy of its ambition; with generously-paid contributors, a carefully prepared book department, reviews of current opinions and movements in religion, correspondence from liberal thinkers abroad, THE INDEX ought to be as superior to the sectarian journals in literary wealth and finish as it is in intellectual tone. The era of quarterlies is ended. Monthlies are almost too bulky to move. The present is the epoch of the weekly. A radical weekly should be, in ability and range, the peer of the London Spectator. Will not the friends of perfectly free thought in religion take the matter to heart, lay it to their conscience, and show a faith in ideas at least as great as their neighbor's faith in opinions? If they will, they will make themselves respected, if nothing more; if they will not, they must not complain when their neighbors class them with sceptics or with recreants.

Faithfully yours, O. B. F.

LIBERAL MOHAMMEDANISM.

An excellent book, entitled A Critical Examination of the Life and Teachings of Mohammed, was published last year in London by Williams & Norgate. It is designed for popular reading, yet crowds into its three hundred and fifty invitingly-printed pages enough of facts and of acute historical analysis amply to justify its title. But the most remarkable thing about it is that it is written in clear and elegant English, by a native Mohammedan, born (probably) in India, of an ancient Mohammedan family of Perso-Arabic stock, and still adhering to Mohammedanism as the highest and best of all the special religions. His name is Syed Ameer Ali, and he is a barrister-at-law of the Inner Temple, London. Evidently he is an enlightened general scholar, and is well acquainted with all the numerous works on the religion of Mohammed that have appeared in Christendom. Living in England, too, for several years, he has had abundant opportunity, mingling, as he has, with refined and cultivated people, to observe for himself the modern teachings, institutions, and practice of Christianity. Yet he appears to have found nothing to convince him of the superiority of Christianity, and that he ought to exchange for it the Mohammedan faith in which he was bred.

Still, the author of this book is no bigoted devotee of his religion. He has a fair, open, and candid mind. He clearly means to be impartial. And if, after a critical comparison and practical observation of the workings of the two religions, he has not renounced Mohammedanism for Christianity, it is evidently because he believes the former more rationally supported than the latter, rather than for the reason that he thinks the Mohammedan faith to be the final seat of infallible religious authority. For though a Mohammedan, he is a very liberal Mohammedan,—standing to Mohammedanism as the most advanced of the Progressive Jews and of the Liberal Christians stand to their respective faiths. Perhaps he has advanced even farther than most of these; for he says in the preface to his book: "The gradual enlightenment of the human mind is shown strikingly in the silent change which is taking place in Christendom towards a more liberal conception of the grand work achieved by the Arabian prophet in the seventh century. Maurice, Stanley, and Carlyle, in England; Emerson, Parker, Channing, and Draper, in America—each representing a varied school of thought,—have testified, as the result of earnest study, that Islam, instead of the evil names heaped upon it, merits the thanks of humanity. In this gradual enlightenment, in this communion of sympathy, lies the hope of those great minds who look forward to the final commingling of sects and creeds in one universal brotherhood." In this last sentence he seems to indicate—as also again at the close of his book—that he shares the hope of those who think that all special religions are in time to lose their exclusive authority and to pass away.

Yet Ameer Ali finds the bulk of Christian writers on the faith of Islam beginning their work with some preconceived Christian theory, or showing in the accomplishment of it some partisan bias, so that the result is anything but fair to his ancestral religion. And it is to correct this unfair judgment, this prejudiced opinion—which is the average opinion of Christendom concerning Mohammedanism—that the book is mainly directed. To this aim the author sets himself with skill and earnestness, and with the step of one who is clearly confident of the solidness of the ground beneath him. Sometimes, perhaps, in his zeal he claims overmuch for the faith he is thus defending against the assaults of Christian prejudice, and the advocate appears rather than the judge; yet the facts he brings forward, it must be confessed, generally present a strong array of proofs for his positions. And it is exceedingly instructive, as well as interesting, to see in how different a light the facts may be put, by one writing out of the very heart of the faith itself, from that in which they are accustomed to be regarded, by those who look at them from the standpoint of a rival faith. Even the same arguments which Christian writers are wont to use for proving the superiority of Christianity to all other religions reappear in this book, and apparently with quite as good success, to prove that Mohammedanism is entitled to this first rank among historical faiths.

Thus, for instance, those who have read Rev. J. F. Clarke's Ten Great Religions will remember his urgent advocacy of the view that Christianity is a pleroma,—that it sums up all the essential truths of all other religions, and is a well-rounded whole, full where other religions are defective,—therefore, the universal and absolute religion. Ameer Ali takes precisely the same view of Mohammedanism in relation to preceding religions. He argues that Christianity is deficient on some points where Islam is well developed; and he makes a pretty strong case for his position,—especially on the points of rational practicality in respect to moral precepts and the dignity of human nature. "Islam," he says, "combines all the highest principles which have actuated humanity from the time it saw light on the earth." And again: "It is the distinctive characteristic of Islam that it combines within itself the grandest and the most prominent features in all ethnic and catholic religions, compatible with the reason and moral intuition of man."

So, too, Christian writers are wont to speak of the peculiar capacity of Christianity to adapt itself to all nations and all times: they claim that it is the most expansive and elastic of religions. Ameer Ali says the same of his faith,—points out its "catholicity," its "expansiveness," "the wonderful adaptability of its precepts for all ages and nations." Christian writers are in the habit of saying that Christianity gave the impulse to modern civilization,—that it is the life of science, literature, art, philanthropy. But this Mohammedan author sets against this claim the fact that, "during centuries of moral and intellectual desolation in Christian Europe, Islam led the vanguard of intellectual progress," and then makes the counter claim that, not only during these centuries did learning and the arts and sciences flourish under Moslem sway, but it was Moslem influence in favor of free thought and rational inquiry that gave the impulse whence came the Protestant Reformation and all that it has done for civilization. "Islam," he says, "inaugurated the reign of intellectual liberty." And for this latter claim he has pretty good original ground in the teachings of its prophet, who, according to some traditional sayings, rather deified than decried reason. "The ink of the scholar," he was accustomed to say, "is more sacred than the blood of the martyr." And once he said: "It is related that God created reason, and it was the most beautiful thing in his creation; and God said to it, 'I have not created anything better or more perfect or more beautiful than thou; blessings will come down on mankind on thy account, and they will be judged according to the use they make of thee.'"

But, while claiming so high a position for Islam among the world's faiths, Ameer Ali is evidently a believer in the natural development of religious ideas; and his book is valuable, not only as presenting to English readers within Christendom an inside view of the Mohammedan faith, but also because it is a contribution to the general science of religious development. W. J. P.

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—By this time you and your readers will have been amply dosed with reports of the great London Mission of 1874, and must be quite convinced of its utter failure.

One is beginning to grow a little weary of the many smart things that have been said to heap ridicule on what was palpably an anachronism.

For my part, I am extremely glad that the experiment was made, because it elicited from unexpected and very influential quarters protests of such a nature as to disclose how far the writers had travelled from the old standpoint of orthodoxy.

But surely the "Mission" and its failure ought to leave behind it thoughts of a more worthy kind than those of mere exultation over a decaying superstition. Theodore Parker set us a good example in this respect; for whenever his attention was turned to the subject of religious revivals, he not only condemned the palpable mischief which they wrought, but pointed out wherein we needed a real revival, and roused enthusiasm in the pursuit of a higher virtue.

There can be no question that the average state of morality is below what it ought to be—I do not mean merely below the ideal perfection which most men are capable of conceiving, but below what we ought consistently to attain to, considering we have shaken off the many encumbrances of early religious education, and have had now some years of free thinking in which our nobler thoughts have had time to develop into nobler action.

It must be owned that we have shown more anxiety to detach ourselves from superstitious theories, and to renounce communion with religious sectaries, than to make ourselves obnoxiously distinguished in our day for renunciation of the mean and wicked ways of the world around us. In many matters, small and great, free thinkers do not make that moral protest which they of all men ought to make against the iniquity which abounds.

One of the most popular of the free-thought shibboleths is "The Enthusiasm of Humanity," by which term I suppose is understood a sense of duty to mankind rising into a fervor of affectionate regard, and a passion of devotion to the well-being of others.

If this is really a marked feature in the new era of religious liberty, what revolutions it ought to work in the homes and daily lives of those who boast of their freedom! No doubt, in some cases, free thought has brought with it newness of life and great advances in practical goodness; but this result cannot have been very extensive or deep, or else it would already have attracted the attention of the world at large.

One would like to ask such questions as these:—

Are the families of free thinkers more united and happy than those of the orthodox?

How do they treat their servants? As before? Or with a constant and tender consideration?

Are they less particular or more particular in observing the canons of domestic morality?

In their intercourse with others are they now strictly truthful and kind and courteous?

In their business, do they or do they not continue to countenance and to share in the customary vices, frauds, tricks, and legalized dishonesty which all good men bewail?

Have we had any martyrs to honesty and veracity, as we have had and are still having to heresy and free thinking?

Is personal moral restraint made the rule of life, or is the aim of life to get as much as possible of mere enjoyment, regardless of its cost to others?

People who harangue very much about their "rights" ought surely to be most prominent as the examples of "duty." Surely it is easier to convert others to our opinions by example than by mere precept; and precept not accompanied by example is the worst obstruction that could be put in the way of conversion.

In England and in America we have abundance of national disgrace—I do not mean in our foreign relations, though these are not spotless, but in the cropping up, every now and then, of some gigantic swindle which betrays what is almost universally going on; then we are brought face to face with our shame. Hardly a building rises from the ground, or a railway is laid down, but what is more or less a monument or record of some vile plunder and deception over which capitalists and contractors have wrangled. Everywhere are jobbers and go-betweens making large incomes by nefarious means, and giving fictitious prices to property comparatively valueless.

But the list is endless. All I want to urge is this: let free thinkers put it solemnly before them whether or not they will make a manful stand against this wide-spread and all but inveterate dishonor. For dishonor it is, and no one can deserve the time-honored epithet of "gentleman" whose word and promise cannot be absolutely trusted in every transaction of life.

If we are to be no better than our neighbors, if all the subtle forms of selfishness are still to be maintained in spite of our advanced theories, we might just as well have remained in the stagnant but peaceful waters of orthodoxy, and have spared ourselves the pain and toil of our desperate escape.

If no other motive were left us; if not even the pride of consistency stirred us to reform our every-day morals, we should still, for very shame, be impelled, by the jealous and watchful criticism of our orthodox opponents, to avoid giving them occasion to sneer at our fruitless free-thinking, and to scoff at our self-righteous airs.

The world was never yet benefited by more enlightened opinion, until that opinion found expression in deeds. And if we, coming every day more and more into observation as a body or class of men and women, cannot show some fruits of our faith in a purer and nobler type of living, we shall deserve, and most assuredly get, our share of that contempt which we have not scrupled to pour upon the palpably inane undertaking of the London Mission.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

Charles Voysey.

Camden House, Dulwich, S. E., March 2, 1874.

[I cannot help saying amen to these noble and needed words of Mr. Voysey. If truer thought does not make truer manhood and womanhood,—if radicalism does not render us all more honest, honorable, and sincere,—the free religious movement is a miserable failure. Mr. Voysey has laid us all under obligation by his manly summons to put our principles into daily practice. In this he utters the central purpose of The Index.—F. E. A.]

MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION.

SIXTH HEARING.

The Committee on Just and Equal Taxation gave a continued hearing Thursday morning.

Mr. White, Secretary of the Board of Education, made a powerful appeal for the exemption from tax of educational and religious institutions. He explained the charter of Williams College, which by that charter is a private charitable institution, for the purpose of distributing the alms and bounty of the founder. It is a private corporation for public uses. The funds of the college are sacredly held and devoted to the maintenance of this college for the advancement of knowledge and piety. The Trustees are invested with the power to hold and use these funds for these purposes, and any attempt to take away that power is a violation of that charter; and under the Dartmouth College case it cannot be done. Some people say that taxation does not take away the power, or affect the charter. It does. The right to taxation implies the right to annihilate the property taxed.

Williams College, and property belonging to it, is put down on the tax list at a valuation of $480,000. It is too high; but at that valuation the tax, at the rate of a little under one cent and a half, would amount to over $4000 a year, which would be taken out of the income of the college. The professors receive $2000 annually. The tax, if paid, would necessitate the vacating of two of the professors' chairs, or else the college would have to run in debt, or else beg, as it does not pay its expenses now. Taxation, therefore, would be destruction to that college. If the graduates of the college living in other States are asked to contribute funds to the college, they will reply, If college property is taxed, that they prefer to invest their money where it will not be taxed. We cannot afford to make such a claim of taxation more nice than wise.

If the Legislature taxes the property of Williams College, which is composed of funds given by the State and private individuals, for specific purposes, for the advancement and interest of the college, it takes away property of the college just to the extent of the proportion of the interest it takes away. The interest of $7500 is applied annually to the assistance of indigent young men worthy of aid. For forty-three years has this amount been thus expended.

Does the State wish to come in, and, by taxing this property, say that it is ashamed to aid indigent young men? Williams College has an immunity against taxation which carries with it the right of destruction. Let Williams College be taxed, and sufficiently so to be destroyed, Williamstown will go out of existence. Education is the wealth of the State. It promotes thrift, elevates the lower classes, lessens crime, and increases the value of taxable property, and promotes the productive industry of the State.

The lower grade of schools depends upon the higher. On the prosperity and educational influence of colleges depend the common schools. They cannot exist without the higher institutions. Our fathers showed their view of this when the first institution they established was a college. In the foundation of many of the towns of this Commonwealth, they were required, within three or five years, among other things, to devote one piece of land to a settled minister, and another for the support of the minister, a third for the schools; and they were also required to build a meeting house, and settle and support a learned and godly minister. Many towns use the funds from those lots to-day in support of the schools. These schools keep their corporation in existence. They receive aid from the State. They make arrangements with the town so that the committee vote the funds of the town for the purpose of carrying on schools in these buildings. It is so with the Deerfield Academy, and others. The educational funds of the towns are devoted to sustaining schools in the building which the corporation thus founded own. Tax this property, and you change the relation of the corporation to the town, and this is the first step toward annihilation.

If churches are taxed, the principle upon which our fathers acted will be violated. The taxation of churches is a refinement of modern invention. Churches are educational institutions. No boy can grow up to manhood, having listened to the well prepared and carefully written instruction given from the pulpits Sunday after Sunday, without having received an education which is of incalculable benefit to him. Our clergy are educating our people by their Sabbath ministrations.

He closed by hoping that this Legislature will do as the New Jersey Legislature did, defeat the proposition to tax such institutions.

Mr. Edward Dickinson, representing Amherst College, said that of the income of $75,000, which is a charity fund, five-sixths is expended annually for the assistance in education of young men who are unable to support themselves. Scholarships amounting from $70 to $100 annually are given to 130 students. The tuition of the students represents less than one-half the expense of educating them. There is college property amounting in value to $60,000. The sum represented by taxation of this property will support three professors, and if it is taxed the college would be deprived of them, which would greatly cripple it, in these days when the advancement of education demands an increase of professors and larger salaries, rather than a decrease of instructors. All the real estate of the college used for other purposes than strictly college purposes is now taxed.

Mr. John P. Tarbell, of Boston, made a general plea against taxing religious and charitable institutions. If charitable institutions are taxed the poor suffer. The poor are taxed. The ability of these institutions to assist them is lessened. The rich do not directly suffer, but the public gain nothing by it. If these institutions are deprived of their ability to help the poor, the sick, the needy, the suffering, the public institutions and funds will be called on to do it, so there is no gain. It is simply taking out of one pocket to put into the other.

Churches should not be taxed, because they instruct in virtue and morality, and thus are a benefit to the community. It is sacrilege to tax churches. United States bonds are not taxed because the loan is a benefit to the country. Churches should not be taxed for the same reason. They are a confessed benefit to every community in which they are established. Free churches should not be taxed, although the churches that are leased for revenue should be taxed to the amount of that revenue.

Mr. Alpheus Hardy urged that just taxation is defeated by the law which allows a man to own property in Boston, and by acquiring a residence out of the city to escape taxation on personal property. He gave an instance of a town where the taxable property has increased from $12,710 in 1865 to $4,106,000 in 1870. The rate is but a little over 5 1-2 per cent. He spoke strongly against the law of settlement, allowing a person to name his place of residence for the purpose of evading taxation. Taxes in Boston are higher than in any other city, and not a sale in the burnt district has brought its full valuation, as shown by the assessors' books. Men are obliged to leave Boston because every kind of personal property is taxed. More equal taxation is needed, and can be in some way secured.

Judge Warren, in a general proposition, argued that all church property, in existence or contracted for, should be exempted from taxation, because churches are doing the work of the State. These should be exempted, whatever may be the course of the State hereafter.

He also claimed that literary and charitable institutions should, for the same reason, be exempted. He suggested that all future petitions for exemption be referred to a board of inquiry.

Adjourned until Tuesday, when the subject of mortgaged property will be considered. On Thursday, the case of the petitioners will be closed. — Journal, March 20.

Lord Chancellor Thurlow was distinguished for many valuable qualities, not including piety. He had made his brother a bishop, and after the chancellor had died of the gout, a fellow-clergyman asked this dignitary what had been the spiritual condition of the deceased in the closing days of his life. The bishop replied that it was hoped it had been gracious, for in the midst of his paroxysms, the chancellor had been heard frequently to call upon the name of his Blessed Redeemer.

THE BASIS OF PROPERTY.

PRINCETON, Mass., March 11, 1874.

MR. EDITOR:—

In a friendly notice of my address before the Second Radical Club, in THE INDEX February 5, remarking that you did "not see how to reconcile" my assertion that property in land or other natural resources is inadmissible with the claim of labor "to all it creates," since it "creates nothing but the form of materials," you said:—

"The man who sells a thousand of bricks claims ownership in the bricks, because he has impressed his labor on the clay they are made of; but how, on the above principles, does his labor make the clay his property, when it is still nothing but "natural resources," and therefore, as alleged, no man's special property? No answer could be got to this question; can Mr. Heywood give any answer to it?"

It is true that labor, which merely moves things, creates only an impression, a modification, not materials themselves. Hence it is naturally impossible for one to own materials. The assumed right to property in raw materials is the entrance of fraud; since if one, by such claim, gets more of another's service than he returns a labor equivalent for, he invades the property of the other to that extent. All laws which sanction property in land or its kindred resources deny a cardinal principle of political economy, that labor is the source of wealth. If one owns bricks "because he has impressed his labor on the clay," why should capitalists, who do not soil their hands in the processes of making bricks, pocket most of the money which bricks sell for, while the poor fellows who do the dirty work live in squalid destitution? It is the conceded right to property in unmodified clay which enables the capitalist to inflict this monstrous injustice. Undoubtedly the fact that one has expended labor on materials establishes his right to the possession of those materials against all who have invested no service in them. But possession is one thing and property is quite another; for property implies a sale; and if one sells more than he owns (that is, more than what he has earned), he steals. Well did Theodore Parker feel that "there is terrible injustice somewhere in our property laws." Pious people would not be asking $60 a foot for the "Old South Church" lot, did not the Christian-Infidel barbarism, which prevails in Boston, enable them to hope that thereby they can get a half million dollars, for which they return not one cent's worth of honest service! Slaveholders held negroes as property because traditional usurpation and consenting social and political aid enabled them to enforce that claim. When abolitionists succeeded in making generally known the now recognized fact that negroes are not naturally the property of white men, society declined longer to assist masters, and their victims went free. So now by traditional imposition and State aid men claim to own land and other natural resources; but when labor-reformers purify the air of such false notions, society will be as reluctant to assist in this theft as in the other.

Again you said:—

"A new and very important statement on the interest question leaked out. Mr. Heywood conceded that the lender might charge equitably about one-half per cent. for the cost, risk, sacrifice, &c., involved in the loan. Now this one-half per cent. is what the world calls interest. Mr. Heywood may call it the cost of the transaction, or what he pleases; the point is that, when the loan is returned, any increase of the exact amount borrowed is interest, and it is ludicrous to talk of abolishing interest when the great reform consists in merely reducing the rate. Is that all our anti-interest friends mean? If so, the whole principle they have seemed to be contending for vanishes in smoke."

If the cost of loaning money is one-half of one per cent., dealers may justly charge that amount. But in saying that "this is what the world calls interest," it is not clear to what "world" you refer. Dictionaries say that interest is "a premium or sum of money given for the use or loan of another sum of money." Political economists all coincide with Adam Smith in the opinion that "that derived from money by the person who does not employ it himself, but lends it to another, is interest." Bastiat, the celebrated French advocate of usurers, said: "The circulation of capital and the cost which it involves is one thing; interest on capital is quite another." State Street brokers would hardly presume to say that the $2,627,990 profit on bank stock and other vested interests, payable this month of March in Boston [see Boston Journal, Feb. 28], is only the cost of the transactions! I discuss interest as a question of costs in order to concede to usurers, at the outset, all they can possibly claim; namely, that money has the same rights as other species of property,—though they cannot logically claim all of that ground, for credit enters largely into currency, and credit is naturally gratuitous. If service ought not to determine price, and therefore the basis of property and exchange, will you be kind enough to tell me what should?

E. H. HEYWOOD.

[When there is a scarcity of a needed article in the market, buyers compete with each other for it; and he gets it who is willing to pay the most for it. When there is a glut of the article in the market, sellers compete with each other; and he succeeds in selling who is willing to sell the lowest. This is the LAW which determines prices, at least wholesale prices; and it cannot be got rid of until all competition is suppressed. If it is wrong for the seller to sell above cost-price in the first case, it is wrong for the buyer to buy below cost-price in the second case. But we never heard of any complaint made by labor reformers that articles were sold too cheap, even if the price taken was far below cost. In truth, we do not see how it is possible to regulate prices by any theory whatever, so long as everybody wants to get the best possible article for the least possible price. If the alternating competitions of buyers and sellers can be got rid of, cost can be made the price in all cases,—not merely the "limit of price," which seems to be all that the "cost principle" contemplates. If these competitions cannot be got rid of, then our labor friends are attempting to annul a law of Nature, and will hardly succeed.—ED.]

AGAIN.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I am surprised that you should not see my point, or seeing should evade it. If you do not mean, by the first paragraph I quoted, that women should—until enfranchised—be legally exempt from paying taxes, what do you mean? If you do mean that, I challenge you to show that the exemption would not lead to precisely the frauds and evasions at which I hinted—to be dealt with, I suppose, by a new brood of spies and informers.

You say, exempt in part, as the State does now. Non-voters pay no capitation tax. Whether this is exemption enough, is not just now the question. At any rate, it is more than a good many men think worth paying for the privilege, and many a voter is brought to the polls only by party managers who pay his poll-tax for him.

Secondly, suppose it assumed that representation—i.e., voting—is the only just ground of taxation, I challenge you to show (which you by no means do) that all or most of those I mention could not fairly claim exemption on that ground: for example, foreigners doing business here, but never intending to be naturalized. Doubtless a reductio ad absurdum is an unpleasant process to submit to; therefore one should be careful in stating his position at the start.

I will add, to prevent cavil, that I am strongly and earnestly in favor of the right of those women to vote whose property is taxed—especially on those local appropriations for which, mostly, they are taxed. This has nothing to do with the general subject of female suffrage as generally put, about which a good deal may be said on both sides. I do not pretend to see my way clear all through. J. H. A.

[To be "exempt from taxation" means to be excused from taxes justly due. Not to be taxed because the protection which alone justifies taxation is withheld, is a very different thing; and this distinction seems sufficiently obvious to be easily intelligible. It would be absurd for Massachusetts to talk of "exempting" real estate in Paris or London, which, of course, she has no right to tax. She can only "exempt" property which is justly subject to taxation by her.

We never "assumed" that representation is the "only just ground of taxation." On the contrary, we have said that protection is its only just ground. If the non-voters mentioned, e.g., foreigners, do not get all the protection they are taxed for, they are unjustly taxed. If they find that non-representation implies non-protection, as the women do, they ought either to be represented or else not to be taxed. We do not pretend to justify any existing practices; we simply state a very clear principle.

Whether a reductio ad absurdum is an "unpleasant process to submit to," we cannot decide in the present instance. Perhaps our esteemed correspondent can enlighten us, when he "sees his way clear all through." As we do not "say, exempt in part," a reductio based on that proposition does not at all reach us.—ED.]

WHAT DO WE REALLY MEAN?

Who can complain now-a-days if called upon to explain his meaning? So many trains of thought may be suggested in a single sentence, and so many mental exceptions and admissions may be made which do not appear in the utterance, that he would be more than human who was never misunderstood.

I once believed that the editor of THE INDEX denied the existence of anything analogous to what is understood by intuition, while now, if I understand him correctly, it is the method he objects to as "irreconcilable to the method of science." Objection to the idea of "the subjective revelation of a supernatural object." Objection to "the intellectual analysis and interpretation of experiences by no means monopolized by intuitionalists." The "experiences" alluded to I assume to be the promptings of the inner man, an impulse of the spirit, more marked in some than in others, but never supernatural. Imperfect or fallible in its operation, because the conditions for the highest development of our spiritual nature are seldom complied with. All that comes to us in this way to be submitted to the test of "reason, the prime minister of the spirit." Thomas Paine refers to "thoughts we produce ourselves by reflection and the act of thinking, and those that bolt into the mind of their own accord," and says, "It is from these voluntary visitors that I have acquired almost all the knowledge that I have." Will the editor of THE INDEX please inform me if this is what he refers to as "experiences not monopolized by intuitionalists"?

Again. Mr. Mills takes exception to the expression, "the age of faith has gone," etc., and the explanation comes that it is "the age of ecclesiastical faith that is passing away," and that "the age of knowledge that is arriving will have its faith, too, born of experience, science, and reason."

Mr. Stebbins alludes to this in his interesting communication in THE INDEX of Feb. 19, and says: "Knowledge, experience, and reason are not to be set aside or slighted; but back of all is the soul, and all these are but the processes of its life and being."

Now I find Mr. Abbot has given partial, if not full, justice to this truth in the closing sentences of his tract on the "God of Science." And I think Mr. Stebbins will agree with me that his own allusion to "the chill twilight of the unknown and unknowable" is also met by Mr. Abbot with a faith in the "infinite Reality;" a faith not alone the product of the internal prompting, nor of the external evidence, but a harmonious blending of the two. Here is the quotation: "Our own innermost life is shared with the All. Nature is no step-mother to her children. Whispers and hints of the love she bears us reach our hearts in our own best aspirations and endeavors. Dreams and visions of the poet, true to the soul as are the vigorous demonstrations of science to the intellect, awaken a consciousness of the unity between our own restricted life and the universal life that overlaps it all. Well did the ancients speak of the earth as 'mother.' Between the heart of Nature and the heart of man is a unity so profound that the mere thought of it is music of sweetness unsurpassed. The song is of a love feebly shadowed forth by human ties,—of a oneness infinitely higher even than that of love,—and of a destiny too vast ever to be revealed in advance of the great reality. Science will never seal up the fountain-head of this inward melody, but rather open new channels for its blessedness through the whole mind of man. I care nothing for the name of the great eternal fact of Being. Call it Nature, or God, or what you will; it is, and will be forever, the ultimate goal of all that is best in humanity. It is the study of this infinite reality, not the 'unknowable' but the truly known to the extent of our knowledge of universal Nature, that gives origin to the idea of God; and perish what may from the world's perfected thought, I believe that this idea of God, the grandest product of the human brain, will survive forever."

I do especially recommend the above quotation to that good friend who writes to Mr. Abbot, "If you would only see, what I am sure you have felt." It seems to me that there is not a little of both "seeing and feeling" in the entire lecture on "The God of Science."

I suppose I have complained as much as any one in my private letters to THE INDEX, that the spiritual was not properly recognized in its columns; and yet I confess I never could have gone from Orthodoxy to Free Religion, had I not discovered in many of the advocates of the latter (some of whom are taken to task for a supposed lack of feeling or faith) a recognition and grateful acknowledgment of the internal sight and prompting.

After all, our faiths are our luxuries. Charles Lamb humorously remarks, that "the truth is too precious to be spoken every day," and evidently some people so regard their faith; yet I believe that the clear, ringing utterance of an exalted faith has an electrical effect which the world cannot afford to lose, and that too often are our best, our deepest convictions suppressed.

The danger, however, is not that faith will leave us, but that other elements of positive religion will be neglected.

The clergy warn us to escape from some future perdition; but how singularly hard for the world to emphasize the duties of the here and now, to unite in practical means for an escape from the present Hades of discord, the mitigation of human misery all about us, the attainment of that harmony which is heaven itself, the kingdom of heaven on earth! The ecclesiastical idea of "heavenly harps" must give place to more tuning here below. Were we in better tune, we might sing the "new song" now. W. F. P.

NEW ORLEANS, La., March, 1874.

ANOTHER "LEAGUE."

EAU CLAIRE, Wis., March 10, 1874.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The liberals in this city, to the number of thirty, met in Concert Hall on Sunday, March 1, 1874, and there organized a Liberal League, adopting THE INDEX "Articles of Agreement" and a few necessary by-laws. The following officers were elected, the term of office being six months:—

President—Rev. S. J. Dickson.
Vice-President—Mrs. T. D. Giddings.
Secretary—Will Kennedy.
Treasurer—Mr. Gunn.
Executive Committee—Mr. T. D. Giddings, Mrs. F. F. Dickson, Mr. Jenks.

The regular meetings of the League are to be held every second Sunday.

The Secretary was instructed to report the organization of the League to THE INDEX and Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

On account of the bad weather, fewer persons were present at the organization than were expected. We look for a rapid growth shortly.

WILL KENNEDY, Secretary.

THE BAPTIST denomination is to-day, numerically, seventeen times as strong in proportion to the population as it was one hundred years ago.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

" 13 " 25	"	8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"	6	"	"
" 52	"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

BUST OF
THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished n plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

$5 TO $20 PER DAY easily made by any one. We want men, women, boys, and girls all over the country to sell our fine Steel Engravings, Chromos, Crayon Drawings, Illuminations, Photographs, etc., etc. We now publish the finest assortment ever placed before the public, and our prices are marked down so low as to defy all competition. No one subscribes for a premium-giving paper in order to get a picture, after seeing our pictures and learning our prices. We have many old agents at work for us, who have made canvassing for books, papers, etc., their business for years, and they all report that they can make much more money at work for us than at anything else. Our prices are so low that all can afford to purchase, and therefore the pictures sell at sight at almost every house. New beginners do as well as agents who have had large experience, for our beautiful subjects and low prices are appreciated by all. To make large sales everywhere all an agent has to do is to show the pictures from house to house. Don't look for work elsewhere until you have seen what great inducements we offer you to make money. We have not space to explain all here, but send us your address and we will send full particulars, free, by mail. Don't delay if you want profitable work for your leisure hours, or for your whole time. Now is the favorable time to engage in this business. Our pictures are the finest and most pleasing in this country, and are endorsed by all the leading papers, including the New York Herald. Those who cannot give the business their entire attention can work up their own localities, and make a handsome sum without ever being away from home over night. Let all who want pleasant, profitable employment, without risking capital, send us their addresses at once, and learn all about the business for themselves. Address

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

ONE WHOLESOME effect of the late general election in England, it is said, is that new Reformers' Clubs and Liberal Associations are springing up all over the country.

"THE FIRST duty of the people," says the New York Evening Post, "is to suppress the Democratic party." And it looks now as though the next duty of the people would be to suppress the Republican party also.

THE FOLLOWING is the finest stanza in Tennyson's long poem to the new Russian bride of Queen Victoria's son:—

"For thrones and peoples are as waifs that swing,
And float or fall, in endless ebb and flow;
But who love best have best the grace to know
That Love by right divine is deathless King."

THE CONFEDERATE General Jubal Early, of Virginia, says that his State does not get any benefit from sending senators and representatives to Congress, and he therefore advises that they be kept at home, and their salaries be paid into the State treasury. This is the earliest suggestion of the kind which we have seen, but it is not a bad one. Perhaps some of the other States will by-and-by make a similar one.

A REMARKABLE American poet says: "It seems to me there is something very fine and dignified in that kind of reform which begins at home and works at home, and acts from within and not from without." It certainly would be very well if every reformer should bear in mind that, if he succeeds thoroughly in reforming one person—namely, himself,—he is doing the best possible work for humanity. He creates a little leaven that will help to leaven the whole lump.

THE GREAT QUESTION to which Mr. Disraeli will devote his attention, as premier of England, it is said, will be that of Land Reform. As the greater part of the land in England is concentrated in comparatively very few hands, and as this process of concentration has increased of late years, it would seem that the new ministry could not do a better thing than contrive some plan whereby the land rights may be made more equal between the productive and the non-productive classes.

LORD RUSSELL once said to David Hume: "What do you consider the object of legislation?" The reply was: "The greatest good to the greatest number." His lordship continued: "What do you consider the greatest number?" Mr. Hume promptly answered: "Number one, my lord." This was very good; for any government which seeks only the greatest good of the greatest number—neglecting the rights of the minority, even the minority of one—may be insufferably tyrannous.

"CHANGE IS IN the air," says Professor Huxley in his Aberdeen address. "It insists on reopening all questions, and asking all institutions, however venerable, by what right they exist, and whether they are or are not in harmony with the real or supposed wants of mankind." In this continued "reopening," we imagine, some present radicals will turn out future conservatives; for it is the constitutional limitation of some minds to think that no one need go any farther in reform than they themselves are willing to advance.

IN SPEAKING of the discouraging prospects which beset Mr. Garrison's opening crusade against slavery, and the wonder that, under the circumstances, he did not abandon the noble enterprise, Oliver Johnson says: "He would have done so, if he had not been the divinely appointed man for the hour." It is probably more rhetorical than real to speak of any particular man as "divinely appointed." Hence comes the pernicious Messianic notion, the conceit of leadership, and so forth. All men are divinely appointed! And the moment of inspiration begins with every man when he first becomes conscious of his divine destiny to live, and to live truly, faithfully, and nobly!

NOT ONLY in Congress but out of it the discussion upon finance goes on. The people are quite as much interested in the subject, and perhaps quite as wise, as their legislators. Some are in favor of a specie basis, others of a labor basis, and still others of a land basis, for our national currency. We confess that we are not wise enough to say which is best; but we are glad to see the discussion take place, and believe that only good can be the result of it. And we note with particular interest that Radical Clubs are engaged in this important discussion. Mr. E. M. Davis, of Philadelphia, sends to us an able paper on Money, read before the Radical Club of that city, of which he is President, by Charles Sears, Esq.; and Mr. Davis himself has written ably and learnedly on this whole subject.

HOW MUCH more apt people are to go begging to God than to go thanking to him! When they are in any sort of trouble they hasten to God with importunities for relief, but so long as they have no special need for his intervention they forget to be thankful for ordinary favors. The people in a certain section in North Carolina are just now frantic with fear lest Bald Mountain should become a destructive volcano, and so they prayed in steady succession for sixteen days and nights. But to what effect? God will not stop any order of Nature to please us. There are no accidents in his universe. Everything proceeds by law. And when we come to realize that everything is well because God reigns, we shall cease to be beggars before him, but continually celebrate his wisdom and his goodness.

REV. C. W. BUCK, of Portland, Maine, in an able sermon on Biblical Inspiration, in which he argues for the spiritual rather than the literal view of inspiration, says:—

The Bible needs no defence; certainly not any defence by erroneous teaching. That defence has brought it already under the condemnation of many. No, the Bible not only needs no defence, but proves incontestably its enduring vitality, by surviving so long the maltreatment to which it has been exposed at the hands of its defenders. Its real worth—like all real worth—is imperishable. I have read words culled with careful selection from the books of other religions; and there are words in the Bible that, in my judgment, at least, far surpass their highest reach. I have searched the "Bible of the Ages," a collection of wise sayings by sages of every time, to find in it some words of religious confidence and hope, and found none that could compare with the sublime utterance of the Psalmist, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want," and so forth.

FROM THE Law to Literature is a step, we should say which any one loving books might take with gladness—as, indeed, from any active pursuit to one so beset with charms, and rich with pure delights. Hon. Nathaniel Holmes, formerly Royal Professor of Law in Harvard University, and Judge on the Supreme Bench of Missouri, in his later days permits himself release from weighty cares, and full opportunity to "breathe the still air of delightful studies." He is a constant and interested reader of THE INDEX, considering it, as he himself assures us, "one of the foremost papers of the age." Besides being a wise student of the best literature, ancient and modern, he finds time occasionally to write a valuable essay. The St. Louis Globe, of February 15, contains one from his pen on Providence and Fate, which he read to the University Club of that city. We hope hereafter to find room in THE INDEX for some extracts from this learned treatise; and in the meantime we thank him for a copy of it.

COMMEMORATIVE SERVICES AT SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL, FINSBURY, LONDON, FEBRUARY 22, 1874. WITH A DISCOURSE

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

I.

I cannot plainly see the way,
So dark the grave is; but I know
If I do truly work my day
Some good will brighten out of woe.

For the same hand that doth unbind
The winter winds, sends sweetest showers,
And the poor rustic laughs to find
His April meadows full of flowers.

I said I could not see the way,
And yet what need is there to see,
More than to do what good I may,
And trust the great strength over me?

Why should I vainly seek to solve
Free-will, necessity, the pall?
I feel, I know, that God is love,
And knowing this I know it all.

—Alice Carey.

READINGS.

Whoso seeketh wisdom shall have no great travail; for he shall find her sitting at his door. She goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, showeth herself favorably to them in the highways, and meeteth them in every thought. Love is the keeping of her laws. The multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world.

Wisdom is the worker of all things: for in her is an understanding spirit, holy, one only, manifold, subtile, lively, clear, undefiled, simple, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick, which cannot be letted, ready to do good; kind to man, steadfast, sure, free from care, having all power, overseeing all things; and going through all understanding, pure and most subtle spirits. Wisdom is more moving than any motion: she passeth through all things by reason of her pureness. For she is the breath of the power of God, and a pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty: therefore can no defiled thing fall into her. For she is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness. And being but one, she can do all things; and remaining in herself, she maketh all things new: and in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God, and prophets. She is more beautiful than the sun, and above all the order of the stars: being compared with the light, she is found before it; for after day cometh night, but vice shall not prevail against wisdom.—Wisdom of Solomon.

The Duke Gae asked about the altars of the gods of the land. Tsae-Wo replied: "The Hea sovereign used the pine-tree, the man of the Yin used the cypress, and the man of the Chow used the chestnut,—to cause the people to be in awe."

Confucius, hearing this, said: "Things that are done, it is needless to speak about; things that have had their course, it is needless to remonstrate with; things that are past, it is needless to blame."

Kee-Loo asked about serving the gods. The Master said: "While you are not able to serve men, how can you serve the gods?"

Kee-Loo said: "I venture to ask about death."

The Master said: "While you do not comprehend life, how can you comprehend death?

"If a man in the morning hear of the right way, he may in the evening die without regret.

"Yew, shall I teach you what knowledge is? When you know a thing, consider that you know it; and when you do not know a thing, understand that you do not know it. This is knowledge.

"For a man to worship a deity not his own is mere flattery.

"To give oneself earnestly to the duties due to men, and, while respecting the gods, to respect also their distance, may be called Wisdom."—Confucius.

Mohammed said: Instruct in knowledge! He who instructs, fears God; he who speaks of knowledge, praises the Lord; who disputes about it, engages in holy warfare; who seeks it, adores the Most High; who spreads it, dispenses alms to the ignorant; and who possesses it, attains the veneration and good will of all. Knowledge enables its possessor to distinguish what is forbidden from what is not; it lights the way to heaven; it is our friend in the desert, our society in solitude; our companion when far away from our homes; it guides us to happiness; it sustains us in misery; it raises us in the estimation of friends; it serves as an armor against our enemies. With knowledge, the servant of God rises to the heights of excellence. The ink of the scholar is more sacred than the blood of the martyr. God created Reason, and it was the most beautiful being in his creation; and God said to it: "I have not created anything better or more perfect or more beautiful than thou: blessings will come down on mankind on thy account, and they will be judged according to the use they make of thee."—Mohammed.

If morality is the relation of man to the idea of his kind, which in part he endeavors to realize in himself, in part recognizes and seeks to promote in others, religion, on the other hand, is his relation to the idea of the universe, the ultimate source of all life and being. So far, it may be said that religion is above morality; as it springs from a still profounder source, reaches back into a still more primitive ground.

Ever remember that thou art human, not merely a natural production; ever remember that all others are human also, and, with all individual differences, the same as thou, having the same needs and claims as thyself: this is the sum and substance of morality.

Ever remember that thou, and everything thou beholdest within and around thee, all that befalls thee and others, is no disjointed fragment, no wild chaos of atoms or casualties, but that it all springs, according to eternal laws, from the one primal source of all life, all reason, all good: this is the essence of religion.—Strauss's "The Old Faith and the New."

III.

Fall, fall, ye mighty temples to the ground!
Not in your sculptured rise
Is the real exercise
Of human nature's brightest power found.

'Tis in the lofty hope, the daily toil,
'Tis in the gifted line,
In each far thought divine
That brings down heaven to light our common soil.

'Tis in the great, the lovely, and the true,
'Tis in the generous thought
Of all that man has wrought,
Of all that yet remains for man to do.

Fall, fall, ye ancient litanies and creeds:
Not prayers or curses deep
The power can longer keep,
That once ye held by filling human needs.

The quickening worship of our God survives
In every noble grief,
In every high belief,
In each resolve and act that light our lives.

MEDITATION.

V.

The future hides in it
Gladness and sorrow;
We press still thorow,
Nought that abides in it
Daunting us,—Onward.

And solemn before us,
Veiled the dark Portal;
Goal of all mortal:—
Stars silent rest o'er us,
Graves under us silent.

While earnest thou gazest,
Comes boding of terror,
Comes phantasm and error;
Perplexes the bravest
With doubt and misgiving.

But heard are the Voices,
Heard are the Sages,
The Worlds, and the Ages:
"Choose well; your choice is Brief, and yet endless.

"Here eyes do regard you
In Eternity's stillness;
Here is all fulness,
Ye brave, to reward you.
Work, and despair not!"

—Goethe, tr. Carlyle.

DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS.

Towards the close of the last century, a young German student was climbing amid the Swiss Alps—alpenstock in hand—gazing with wonder on glaciers, scaling the dizziest peaks. His Alpine wanderings were preliminary to the climbing of nobler summits, commanding vaster prospects. For this was Friedrich Hegel, destined to create an epoch in the history of the human mind. Amid those barren heights and weird chasms of Switzerland there was born in his mind a doubt which has influenced the world. Before those wild desolations he asked himself whether it could be possible that this chaos of rock and glacier had been specially created for man's enjoyment? It was a problem which required for its solution not only his own long, laborious life, but many lives; yet, to the philosophical statement of that one man we owe a new order of religious thought. If I may borrow an expression from geology, it may be said that we are all living in the Hegelian formation; and this whether we understand that philosophy or not, and even if we reject its terms. For Hegel was as a great vitalizing breath wafted from afar, beneath which, as under a tropical glow, latent seeds of thought were developed to most various results. From afar: for really Hegel's philosophy was an Avatar for cultivated Europe of the most ancient faith of our race. Its essence is the conception of an absolute idea which has represented itself in Nature, in order that by a progressive development through Nature it may gain consciousness in man, and return as mind to a deeper union with itself. It is really the ancient Hindu conception of a universal soul of Nature, a vast spiritual sea in which each animal instinct, each human intellect, is a wave. Or, in another similitude, every organic form, however great or small, represents some scattered spark of a central fire of intelligence, on the way back to its source, bearing thither the accumulated knowledge gathered on its pilgrimage through many forms in external Nature.

Briefly, the Hegelian philosophy means a soul in Nature corresponding to the soul of Man. Of course—I have already stated it—it did not originate with Hegel. It may be traced from the Vedic Hymn to the cry of Kepler, when, looking up to the stars, he said, "Great God, I think thy thought after thee!" But with Hegel it gained an adaptation to the thought of Europe, and passed into the various forms of belief and feeling. It inspired all the poetry of Wordsworth. It is reflected in the materialism no less than in the idealism of our age, and may be felt in the philosophy of Huxley no less than in that of its best exponent, Emerson.

Among the many German thinkers who sat at the feet of Hegel there was but one who comprehended its tremendous bearings upon the theology of Europe; but one through whom it was able to grow to logical fruitage; and that one was the great man whose life has just closed—David Friedrich Strauss. Strauss proved himself the truest pupil of Hegel by throwing off the mere form of his forerunner's doctrine, just as that philosopher had thrown off the formulas of his forerunners. The literal Hegelians, of course, regarded Strauss as a renegade; on the surface it would so appear. Hegel called himself a Christian, Strauss renounced Christianity; Hegel was designated an idealist, Strauss a materialist. But we must not be victims of the letter. Fruit is different from blossom; but it is, for all that, blossom in another form.

I need not dwell on the outward biography of Friedrich Strauss. The greatest men live in their intellectual works. The sixty-five years of this man were not marked by many salient or picturesque incidents. As a student of theology at Tübingen, and as a professor, he travelled an old and beaten path,—poverty, hard study, hard work. At the age of twenty-seven he publishes his great work, the Leben Jesu; is driven from his professorship; offered another at Zurich University, he is prevented by persecution from holding it; and finally settles himself down to a life of plain living and high thinking. He is elected by his native town Ludwigsburg to the Würtemburg Legislature, but surprises them by his "conservatism," as it was called, and answers their dissatisfaction by resigning. He marries, and, alas! unhappily. Agnes Schebert was an actress, and she was also a clever authoress; but when she was married to Strauss there was shown to be an incompatibility of disposition which led to a quiet separation without recriminations on either side. The lady once wrote a parody on the writing of Hegel, which is amusing, but suggests that she could hardly have been fortunately united with a philosopher who had sat at the feet of Hegel. She left with him a daughter and a son, who were devoted to their father through life, and for whom he wrote a tender and touching account of their mother, that they might think of her with affection.

He lived a busy life, and wrote a large number of admirable works, the absence of most of which from English libraries is a reproach to our literature. His biographies are among the most felicitous that have been written, and have brought before Germans noble figures which are for most English readers mere names,—Ulrich von Hutten, the brilliant radical of the Reformation; the discoverer of lost books of Livy, Quintilian, and other classic authors; the fellow-fugitive of Erasmus before the wrath of the Pope; the lonely scholar who has made classic the islet of Lake Zurich where he died; the Biography of Hermann Reimarus, who one hundred years ago was the leading prophet of Natural Religion;* the Life of Friedrich Daniel Schubart, poet and publicist, who, beginning as an organist in Ludwigsburg, lost his place for writing a parody on the Litany; who in later life was invited by the Duke of Würtemburg to dinner, on his arrival seized and imprisoned in Asberg Castle for ten years, because of an epigram written by the poet,—who, for the rest, has left songs which the Germans still love to sing.† The work of Strauss on Voltaire consists of a series of lectures prepared by request of the Princess of Hesse-Darmstadt (daughter of Queen Victoria), who listened to them; and the work is written in a spirit of high admiration of the great French heretic. If, as I doubt not, the two biographies which he has left—Lessing and Beethoven—are of equal value to those I have mentioned, Strauss will have left six works at least, apart from his contributions to theology, of a character which must write his name very high among the literary workers of this century.

When the life of Strauss is written, no doubt the details of it will be found of great interest; but nothing relating to his private and personal history will ever be so impressive as the unfolding of his intellectual and religious nature. Fully told, even as traceable in his works, this represents the pilgrimage of a soul from the crumbling shrines of superstition across long deserts of doubt, and the rugged passes of adversity, even to the beautiful Temple of Truth,

†The principal is one entitled Caplied (Cape Song), supposed to be sung by soldiers, sold to the Dutch, on their way to the Cape of Good Hope. Another celebrated poem of his is, Die Fürstengrüft (The Tomb of Princes.) where his last hymn of joy ended in the gentle sigh of death.

Of this, his mental biography, I can give here but a slight outline. I have already taken up the thread of his life at the point where he was learning the secret of Hegel. That implied a foreground with which many of us are familiar; for he was born to orthodoxy, and had to flee that City of Destruction. So much he had accomplished in his youth, and was ready to set himself to the real task of his life. The philosophy of Hegel left room for mysticism, but none for miracle. Paulus, Schelling, Schleiermacher, and others, each endeavored in their several ways to bridge over the gulf between supernaturalism and reason; they wanted reason, they must have Christianity, and so held on to the miracles without believing them miraculous. But Strauss had already placed before his mind Truth as the one attainable thing worthy of worship; and he set himself to the task of studying the life of Christ, with all its investiture of fable, as a historical phenomenon. The fables he knew were not true, but he would know how they arose, and he would know what form they would leave were they detached from the New Testament narratives. In reaching his sure result he was aided by the veracity of his mind no less than by his learning. He had but to apply to a miracle found in the Bible the same test which every one applied to a miracle when found in Livy or Ovid. He had but to take the method which Christians used when dealing with the wonders of Buddhism and apply it honestly to the marvels of Christianity. The result was that he tracked all the New Testament marvels back to their Pagan or Judaic origin; he found that they were the same stories that had been told about Moses, Elijah, David, about Isis and Osiris, Apollo and Bacchus. In a word, he proved that they were myths, such as in unscientific ages—when the laws of Nature and the nature of laws were unknown—had arisen and gathered about every teacher who had become an object of popular reverence.

In denying the value of miracles as historical events in the life of a particular man, Strauss was impressed by the perception that these myths which had come from every human race to invest Christ represented something more important than the career of any individual; they represented humanity. They were born out of the human heart in every part of the world, and were types of its aspirations, hopes, and spiritual experiences. That which could not be respected as history could be reverenced as a reflection of the religious sentiment. He would place an idea where the Church set an individual. "Humanity," he wrote, "is the union of the two natures—God become man, the infinite manifesting itself in the finite, and the finite spirit remembering its infinitude; it is the child of the visible Mother and the invisible Father, Nature and Spirit; it is the worker of miracles, in so far as in the course of human history the spirit more and more completely subjugates nature, both within and around man, until it lies before him as the inert matter on which he exercises his active power; it is the sinless existence, for the course of its development is a blameless one, pollution cleaves to the individual only, and does not touch the race and its history. It is humanity that dies, rises, and ascends to heaven, for from the negation of its phenomenal life there ever proceeds a higher spiritual life."

When this lofty faith in humanity as the true Christ, which had unconsciously symbolized itself as the life of one man, shone out upon the mind of Strauss, all interest in the individual Jesus paled under it. Since his great work was published—near forty years ago—we have, by standing on the shoulders of such men as he, been able, no doubt, to see somewhat further. The rational study of the New Testament has disclosed certain fragments of real history, and by piecing these together we can shape out the figure of a great man,—great enough to show why it was that the human heart brought all its finest dreams and marvels to entwine them around that single brow. But the grand generalization of this scientific thinker, who pierced the veil of fable and recognized beyond it the face of humanity transfigured with divine light, is one which can hardly be paralleled by any utterance since the brave words of Paul: "We henceforth know no one according to the flesh; and if we have ever known Christ according to the flesh, yet now we no longer know him." "The Lord is a Spirit!"

Having disposed of the old Christology, Strauss proceeded to apply his method—the method of science—to all the theories of Nature and of human life which were intertwined with it. What the results of his inquiries were are summed up in his last work, The Old Faith and the New. And at the outset I must say that the whole purport of that book has been falsely interpreted for English readers by the blundering exposition of it given by Mr. Gladstone in a speech delivered in Liverpool. The late Prime Minister, it will be remembered, held up Dr. Strauss before the school-children as an awful example of what they would come to if they once began exercising their own faculties. He admitted his own incompetence to answer the arguments of Strauss; it would have been well if he had also acknowledged his inability to translate his words correctly. In describing that "Universum" which Strauss had declared to be the highest and divinest conception of human intelligence, the cosmos which man should adore in place of the old deity of dogma, Mr. Gladstone said that the author represented it—the adorable universe—as without reason. The word which Strauss really uses is "Vernünftvoll"—full of reason! This inexcusable error makes all the difference between theism and atheism. "Our highest idea," says Strauss, "is the law-governed cosmos, full of life and reason;" and he censures Schopenhauer, who declares Nature to be hopelessly evil. "We consider it," he says, "arrogant and profane on the part of a single individual to oppose himself with such audacious levity to the cosmos whence he springs, from which, also, he derives that spark of reason which he misuses. We recognize in this a repudiation of the sentiment of dependence which we expect from every man. We demand the same piety for our cosmos that the devout of old demanded for his God."

In this his last work, The Old Faith and the New—the translation of which we owe to a woman as we do that of his first work—Strauss embraces with enthusiasm the theory of evolution. Thereby his old Hegelian idealism is transmuted to Darwinian materialism. Of course, many people fancy that materialism is something which is inconsistent with a belief in a deity or even in religion. But really, with regard to divine existence and religion there is no difference between idealism and materialism. Strauss justly pronounces the religious issue between the two a quarrel about words. They both and alike "endeavor to derive the totality of phenomena from a single principle—to construct the universe and life from the same block;" in this equally opposing the Christian dualism which divides man into body and soul, and severs God from Nature. In their common endeavor after unity idealism starts from above, materialism starts from below; "the latter constructs the universe from atoms and atomic forces, the former from ideas and idealistic forces. But if they would fulfil their tasks, the one must lead from its heights down to the very lowest circles of Nature, and to this end place itself under the control of careful observation; while the other must take into account the higher intellectual and ethical problems." In short, all that the idealist says of soul the materialist says of brain; all that any worshipper can say of his God, Strauss says of Nature.

What the creed of this thinker was may be found in this last work, wherein it is expressed with an exaltation which becomes more impressive now that we know that, even while he was so uttering his perfect faith in the fair universe, the terrible cancer was destroying him. These are his words: "We perceive in Nature tremendous contrasts, awful struggles; but we discover that these do not disturb the stability and harmony of the whole,—that they, on the contrary, preserve it. We further perceive a gradation, a development of the higher from the lower, of the refined from the coarse, of the gentle from the rude. And in ourselves we make the experience that we are advanced in our personal as well as our social life the more we succeed in regulating the element of capricious change within and around us, and in developing the higher from the lower, the delicate from the rugged. This, when we meet with it within the circle of human life, we call good and reasonable. What is analogous to it in the world around us, we cannot avoid calling so likewise. The cosmos is simultaneously both cause and effect, the outward and the inward together. We stand here at the limits of our knowledge; we gaze into an abyss we can fathom no farther. But this much at least is certain,—that the personal image which meets our gaze there is but the reflection of the wondering spectator himself. At any rate, that on which we feel ourselves entirely dependent is by no means merely a rude power to which we bow in mute resignation, but is at the same time both order and law, reason and goodness, to which we surrender ourselves in loving trust."

In one very important matter many of the admirers of Strauss have felt distress at his position and influence. Politically, he has the reputation of being a reactionist and conservative. This reputation—obtained when he resigned his seat in the legislature because of disagreement with his radical constituency—has been confirmed by his treatment of political subjects in his latest work. My own belief is that the views of Strauss on these matters are very seriously misunderstood by reason of the fact that they are altogether conceived from the Hegelian standpoint. Those who study Hegel know that his apparent conservatism was the crust outside a fiery radicalism. The political philosophy of Hegel is contained in the following extract from his writings: "Moral liberation and political freedom must advance together. The process must demand some vast space of time for its full realization; but it is the law of the world's progress, and the Teutonic nations are destined to carry it into effect. The Reformation was an indispensable preparation for this great work. The history of the world is a record of the endeavors made to realize the idea of freedom and of a progress surely made, but not without many intervals of apparent failure and retrogression. Among all modern failures the French revolution of the eighteenth century is the most remarkable. It was an endeavor to realize a boundless external liberation without the indispensable condition of moral freedom. Abstract notions based merely on the understanding, and having no power to control wills of men, assumed the functions of morality and religion, and so led to the dissolution of society, and to the social and political difficulties under which we are now laboring. The progress of freedom can never be aided by a revolution which has not been preceded by a religious reformation." *

That a similar conviction was rooted in the mind of Strauss I became aware by personal intercourse with him. Some years ago, as I walked with him on the banks of the Neckar, he declared to me that the motives he had in publishing his Life of Christ were hardly less political than religious. "I felt oppressed," he said, "at seeing nearly every nation in Europe chained down by allied despotism of prince and priest. I studied long the nature of this oppression, and came to the conclusion that the chain which fettered mankind was rather inward than outward, and that without the inward thraldom the outward would soon rust away. The inward chain I perceived to be superstition, and the form in which it binds the people of Europe is Christian supernaturalism. So long as men accept religious control not based on reason they will accept political control not based on reason. The man who gives up the whole of his moral nature to an unquestioned authority has suffered a paralysis of his mind, and all the changes of outward circumstances in the world cannot make him a free man. For this reason our European revolutions have been, even when successful, merely transfers from one tyranny to another. I believed when I wrote that book that, in striking at supernaturalism, I was striking at the root of the whole evil tree of political and social degradation."

At another time, when speaking of Renan, whose portrait was the most prominent in his study, he said: "Renan has done for France what I had hoped to do for Germany. He has written a book which the common people read; the influence of my Life of Christ has been confined to scholars more than I like, and I mean to put it into a more popular shape. Germany must be made to realize that the decay of Christianity means the growth of national life, and the progress of humanity."

After this it was very plain to me what Strauss's conservatism amounted to. It means only that he had no faith in the abolition of an abuse here and there when the conditions which produce every abuse remain unaltered,—no faith in sweeping away a few snow-drifts when winter is still in the air, the whole sky charged with snow. We may wish that he had felt more sympathy with some of the popular movements around him; but we must remember that as a philosophical radical he regarded the ever-recurring enthusiasms of the people,—believing that they would reach the millennium by abolishing capital punishment, or abolishing a throne,—as so much waste energy. He saw hopes born in revolutions only to perish in disaster and reaction. He came to rest his hope for humanity, which he loved, on his faith in the omnipotence of that truth which he sought to enthrone above it.

Such was the faith, such the work, of the great man to whose memory we pay this day our heartfelt homage. In his writings I have met with but one allusion to himself. It is in the last pages that he ever wrote, and is as follows: "It is now close upon forty years that as a man of letters I have labored, that I have fought on and on for that which appeared to me as truth, and still more perhaps against that which has appeared to me as untruth; and in the pursuit of this object I have attained, nay, overstepped, the threshold of old age. Then it is that every earnest-minded man hears the whisper of an inner voice: 'Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou may'st be no longer steward.' Now, I am not conscious of having been an unjust steward. An unskilful one at times, too probably also a negligent one, I may, Heaven knows, have been; but on the whole I have done what the strength and impulse within prompted me to do, and have done it without looking to the right or the left, without seeking the favor or shunning the displeasure of any."

These few words represent the benediction of conscience upon a faithful man, felt by him as life was ebbing away, and the dark portal growing more distinct before him. His bitterest enemy need not impugn that approving smile of his own heart. It was all the wage of his work. Others have toiled in full view of heavenly reward. He labored on with hope of no recompense for devotion and self-sacrifice beyond the consciousness of having made his life an unfaltering testimony to truth. Even those who believe that they see gleams of light irradiating the dark valley may count his honor not less, but more that he gave his service uncheered by such visions.

In Heilbronn, where he was residing, he once pointed out to me, near an ancient church, the trace of the old and sacred fountain which gave the town its name, which signifies "healing fountain." He said, with his gentle smile: "The theory of the priests is that the fountain ceased to flow when I came here to reside." When I looked up to his magnificent eyes, and the grand dome of his forehead, I could but marvel at the depth of that superstition which could permit this man to live as a hermit in communities which will one day cherish each place of his dwelling as a shrine. Holy wells may dry up, and the churches beside them crumble, but men will repair to the spots where the lonely scholar sat at his task, and tell their children—Here it was that in the wildernesses of superstition living waters broke out, and streams in the desert.

V.

Everlasting! changing never!
Of one strength, no more, no less;
Thine almightiness forever,
Ever one thy holiness:
Thee eternal,
Thee all glorious we possess.

Shall things withered, fashions olden,
Keep us from life's flowing spring?
Waits for us the promise golden,
Waits each new diviner thing.
Onward! onward!
Why this hopeless tarrying?

Nearer to thee would we venture,
Of thy truth more largely take,
Upon life diviner enter,
Into day more glorious break;
To the ages
Fair bequests and costly make.

By the old aspirants glorious;
By each soul heroical;
By the strivers, half victorious;

* See Gostwick and Harrison's Outlines of German Litera ture, p. 481.

By thy Jesus and thy Paul,
Truth's own martyrs,—
We are summoned, one and all.

By each saving word unspoken;
By thy truth as yet half won;
By each idol still unbroken;
By thy will yet poorly done:
O Almighty!
We are borne resistless on.

THE FUNERAL OF STRAUSS.

A correspondent in a recent number of the American Register, the most widely-circulated American paper in Europe, gives some particulars of the funeral of the late Dr. Strauss from his residence in Ludwigsberg, Würtemberg. Such a burial shows the utter absence of religious belief so widely prevalent in many portions both of Catholic and Protestant Germany. The writer thus describes the last rites:—

"True to the principles which had so long guided his life, he gave the most peremptory orders that no religious ceremonies whatever should be celebrated at his funeral. An immense number of people, some actuated by curiosity, some by a desire to pay the last honors to this eminent writer, assembled before his late dwelling in the Schillerstrasse. The coffin, covered with a profusion of flowers, laurel wreaths, but no cross, was quietly placed in a hearse, and transported to the cemetery, followed by the crowd. Arriving there, it was placed over the newly dug grave, in and around which evergreens were thickly strewn. The relatives drew near, and a choir of friends sang an anthem, chosen for its non-committal sentiments. The anthem concluded, other friends delivered brief discourses, setting forth the struggles of the deceased to maintain a position due to his ultra opinions, and his unwavering adherence to them until death, which he had calmly anticipated and awaited; all of which was a glorious triumph for the cause of 'free thought'. One of the speakers said that the nineteenth century knew not yet the inestimable worth of this great man, but the twentieth and all succeeding centuries would bear testimony to it. To the sound of another softly modulated hymn, the coffin was lowered to its resting place. In accordance with a beautiful German rite, each of the relatives and friends cast a branch of evergreen, or a handful of earth, into the open grave."

HIGGINSON'S TRIBUTE TO SUMNER.

There was a very large audience at Music Hall yesterday forenoon, to hear Col. T. W. Higginson speak of the great Senator. The exercises were introduced with the singing of "Nearer, my God, to Thee," by the whole congregation. Col. Higginson then read selections from the second chapter of the Apocryphal book of the Wisdom of Solomon, and also read an impressive prayer by Theodore Parker. He commenced his remarks by saying that he could not fairly claim to have chosen his subject for the morning. It chose itself. He then alluded to the great orator Demosthenes, and the remark that there were days when Athens had but one voice. When the stranger entered the gates he found a perfect silence, and was informed that Demosthenes was speaking to the assembly. To-day there was but one voice in this city. It comes from that silent form. Those lips which spoke so eloquently in life, never spoke so eloquently as to-day. In the words of Emerson, "The silent organ loudest chants its master's requiem." As he stood at the State House in the morning, he wondered not, Is this Sumner, but, Is this Boston—the Boston that fired one hundred guns for the passage of the Fugitive Slave Bill? This led him to speak of the change that had swept over the appearance of the streets of Boston since the early days of the anti-slavery conflict. This was but a feeble symbol of the moral change between the time when Sumner was first elected and to-day. When Sumner first came forward as an orator in Massachusetts, with his famous speech on the "True Grandeur of Nations," a merchant was heard to say as he left the hall, that if that young man thought the people of Boston would uphold such talk as that he was mistaken. It was not the city of Boston, but the State of Massachusetts that held up Sumner at first, and then he held up Boston until Boston was trained to appreciate its greatest son, until to-day his truest mourners were within the lines of this city. It would take a great many voices to speak of him wisely, yet each could contribute his little all, and he then spoke first of his surroundings, which were one-half of every great man. When he came on the stage in 1851 the greatest nation of the world was in a death-grapple with one great wrong. Everything else was paralyzed, and the anti-slavery pages were torn out of the school-books of John Pierpont, the pioneer abolitionist. The ministers were gagged, or they so opened their lips that men wished they had stayed gagged. Slavery ruled everything at Washington, and Sumner went contrary to his wishes to stand alone to create an issue at Washington; to create a party; to be his own party at the outset. He was doubted by many during the early years of his Congressional life. Then came the assault by Brooks, and the Charlestown Mercury said: "Henceforth Mr. Sumner is dead in the minds of all but poltroons," and to-day by the admission of all who are not poltroons nothing of Charles Sumner is dead but his body. Would to God that all poltroons had died with poor Brooks. (Applause.) He then spoke of how Sumner was fitted for the task. Physically his head was supported by the stateliest of bodies. In youth he was an athlete, and one of the few who swam across the rapids below Niagara. Niagara first; slavery afterward. It is an old Arabic proverb that a man was not called of God until he had reached the age of forty. Sumner had reached the age of forty when God called him. He then spoke of his intellect, and said that it was his purpose to follow the custom of that platform and tell the truth without unmeaning words of eulogy. He was remarkable not so much for the quality of his intellect as for its quantity, and the same was true of Parker. His was not the highest order of creative intellect or scientific genius; it was not the finest structure of philosophic intellect, not the vast military or administrative type. Neither was it peculiarly that which suggested solutions which had been so illustriously shown twice in American affairs, first by Samuel Adams, and last by William Lloyd Garrison. But quantitatively considered he stood above all Americans living or dead. Mr. Sumner himself was well aware of the character of his intellect, and at one time when the people were impatient for him to take immediate action in an important matter he said: "These people seem to forget what I am. I am not a fountain, I am a cistern, and they must give me time to fill up." The speaker then referred to Mr. Sumner's early connection with the anti-slavery movement, and said he was the greatest and strongest disciple who took the teachings of the Liberator, of which he used to boast to Phillips that he commenced to read first. He then alluded to Mr. Sumner's power of condensed statement, and cited such as "Freedom National, Slavery Sectional;" "The Crime against Kansas;" "The Barbarism of Slavery." Seward's "Irrepressible Conflict" was the only condensed expression of the time so important as these. There was a man behind every one of these condensed statements of Mr. Sumner, and they were weighted with the contributions of all literature. His speeches will be read hereafter as literature like those of Edmund Burke, and Sumner had the advantage of making himself heard while he lived, while Burke was known as the "dinner bell," from the fact that his associates left the hall in droves when he began to speak. Sumner's learning astonished scholars, and he was more discriminating and accurate than even Parker. The speaker then read a remarkable letter which Mr. Parker addressed to Mr. Sumner when he was first chosen a United States Senator, urging him still to be a moralist though he had entered politics, and expressing the hope that he would be the Senator with a conscience. He also urged him to build on the Rock of Ages, and look to eternity for his justification, and with absolute integrity Charles Sumner answered to that appeal. He adhered to the truth life long. There was little to say of a course of rectitude so absolute and with such tenacity of purpose. Men praise a coxcomb, but they do not compliment an angel. He was so sturdy and steadfast for the absolute convictions of his conscience that he faced his own party, and even faced the admired of a nation—Lincoln—on the Louisiana question and defeated it. All of the good in the present measures of reconstruction were due to this one triumph of his conscience and will. He never connived at a dishonest trick to save the greatest measure. Fancy Charles Sumner going about button-holing men, or pulling wires, or on the platform of a political convention marshalling people to vote for himself. He was great enough to be painted as he was. His faults were the faults of his strength. There were occasional exaggerations, like those in his attacks upon England and Grant, but they were faults over-stated. He was sometimes called domineering and egotistical, but this was owing to the perfect transparency of his nature. He had nothing to conceal, not even the knowledge of his own vast resources. His was the self-estimate of a man who knew his strength. Once at his home in Washington the speaker asked him what he thought the Supreme Court would decide if certain questions were raised under the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution relative to the right of women to vote. He replied, "I suppose I know more about judges than any man in America," yet there was no unpleasant sense of egotism in this remark to the listener, and when he continued and spoke of his intimacy with Marshall, Story, and other great judges, he proved the assertion, and the speaker would not have doubted him if he had said he knew four times as much of them as any other man. Mr. Sumner continued that he had discovered the fact that there were two ways of getting at any legal decision, either the letter or spirit depending on the general impressions of the judge, and which point of view he wished to take. He said, "Go on with the agitation of the question, and convert the community to woman suffrage as fast as you can, and some day you will find the Supreme Court question settled of itself."

There was some little defect in his tendencies of speech, but not of thought. He had not the magnetic and sympathetic attractiveness as a speaker that some possess. How much this would have been modified by a less lonely life, and the amenities of home and children, no one could estimate. The idea which was prevalent in some quarters that he cared not for individuals was utterly false. He then alluded in a very touching manner to the scene in his death-chamber, where the wise and the learned, the black and the white, were gathered as friends to soothe the suffering. "But," said the speaker, "what must be the essential solitude of a death-bed without a woman's watching or a woman's tears. There were women in Washington who would have walked up the stairway on their knees for the privilege of soothing one pang of the sufferer, but why the door was shut and these women were left outside had not been explained. No man would be more deeply mourned, yet mourning and eulogy amounts to little, save the eulogy silently pronounced by the man or woman who followed his example. The speaker concluded with an appeal to young men and women to follow his example, and stand as he stood, firm and determined in behalf of some of the great reforms of the day, among which he mentioned the woman question, intemperance, labor reform, the civil service, how to keep the Government out of the hands of the corrupt and selfish and put it in the hands of honest men, how to use party without being bound by it. The nation awaits to see how Massachusetts will meet these issues. He alluded to the story of the old Saxon of whom it was reputed that had there been ten like him the Normans would have been driven from the shores of Britain. The battle of our day is with the Normans of corruption. The leader of our ten has fallen, and the nation is looking to Massachusetts to see who will replace him.—Boston Journal, March 16.

THE BUSINESS WOMAN'S MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION.

[We have been requested by "Alice Dutton" to give a "word of notice" to the following circular; but we find it so excellent that it seems proper to publish it in full in THE INDEX, with our heartiest approval of the organization and its object. Similar ones ought to be everywhere established; and the attention of all friends of the cause of woman is called to one of the best plans yet devised to further it.—ED.]

TO THE WOMEN OF BOSTON.

Ladies,—During the month of October, 1873, there appeared at different dates, in the daily papers of Boston, a card addressed to you, signed by "Alice Dutton." This card informed you that it was proposed to organize in this city, as soon as possible thereafter, an association for the benefit of women who support themselves by their own industry. To this proposed organization your attention was called, and for it your sympathy and hearty coöperation asked. The present circular is issued to inform you that this society, under the name of "THE BUSINESS WOMAN'S MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION," was duly organized at 47 Warren Avenue, on Saturday evening, Jan. 17, 1874, and its management placed in the hands of the Board of Directors, whose names terminate this circular.

The object of this association is threefold:—

1st. To provide a fund from which a certain sum shall be paid to any member in case of sickness.

2d. To provide a fund from which members in case of extreme need can obtain small loans, without interest, said loans to be returned by installments, in such sums and at such dates, as shall be agreed upon.

3d. To provide respectable burial to deceased members.

After careful and thorough examination of all available statistics regarding percentage of sickness and death, the directors are satisfied that the rates of fees and benefits proposed by this association, and herein stated, are practicable. We are, therefore, ready to begin and sustain active work the moment we have a sufficient number of members to yield us the sum of four hundred dollars. This amount, it is believed, there will be little difficulty in obtaining, if women will take pains to understand thoroughly the purpose and working-plan of this association.

To the following regulations your attention is earnestly called:—

1st. There shall be two orders of membership—Beneficiary and Honorary.

2d. The number of beneficiary members, under one board of management, shall not exceed two thousand.

3d. Each applicant for beneficiary membership shall be in good health, and between the ages of fifteen and forty years.

4th. The fee for certificate of membership shall be two dollars.

5th. The annual dues shall be three dollars, payable quarterly, half yearly, or yearly, in advance.

Beneficiary members are those for whom the society was formed, and who, having joined it, pay regularly their yearly dues, and are, consequently, entitled to all benefits arising therefrom. Honorary members are those ladies, who, wishing to help the cause, pay the fee of two dollars—or as much more as may seem best to them—for certificate of membership, but who do not pay yearly dues, and who derive, of course, no benefits from the association.

Gentlemen, also, are cordially invited to become honorary members, upon the same terms. The rules in regard to age and health do not apply to honorary members.

In return for the small expense, to beneficiary members, of three dollars per year, or less than one cent for each working day, the following benefits are proposed:

1st. To pay members who are sick, the sum of six dollars per week for every week of sickness, excepting always, the first week, and providing the illness does not exceed six consecutive weeks.

2d. To appropriate fifty dollars for burial expenses of each deceased member.

3d. To loan, without interest, to members in absolute need, duly shown, such small sums of money as the case may require.

Thus it is proposed not only to prevent suffering from want in time of illness, but to render it impossible for any woman, hereafter, to assert, truthfully, that she was driven to destruction for the lack of a few dollars. Indeed, if this association be faithfully sustained, each woman who becomes a member of it, is placed beyond the reach of hopeless desperation.

To prevent the possibility of an exhausted treasury by the demands of those suffering from some trifling physical disturbance—cases which do not at all need pecuniary aid,—it has been decided, in justice to all the members, that for the first week of illness no benefits shall be paid. Cases of illness arising from childbirth, also, can receive no benefits. All other cases of sickness, properly reported, that is, accompanied by a line from a respectable physician, giving name and date of illness, shall meet with prompt attention, and the weekly benefits shall be promptly paid. Especial care will be taken that annoying difficulties shall not intervene between the sick and the benefits to which they are entitled.

As far as the limited space of this circular will allow, the main features of "THE BUSINESS WOMAN'S MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION" have been presented. The work which it proposes to do is before you, and this work it certainly can do if women will unite to sustain it. Similar societies established for men, and supported by men, exist all over America and Europe; hitherto, there has existed for women not one.

The constant complaint among women is that nothing is done to help them, pecuniarily, as a body, in case of need. The constant response of men is, that women will not unite as do men to help each other. With the justice or injustice of this latter assertion the present circular has nothing to do. We only know that by becoming members of, and thus supporting, this association, women will not only effectually disprove the charge, but they will by this simple method do more to defeat the evil effects of unjust wages to women than all that has ever been written or spoken. Sensible, united practical work by women for women, is the crying need, not merely vehement words.

Chief among the evils of unfair wages to women, is the inability to set aside in time of health a sum in any measure adequate for support in case of illness. This is one of the great difficulties met and overcome by the plan of this association. There is no woman who earns her living who cannot lay aside six cents a week to meet the annual dues of this society; and surely there are very few women who support themselves by their own industry, who would not, in the event of sickness and consequent failing salary, find six dollars a week a most desirable income. To many hundreds it would mean all the difference between comfortable independence and painful dependence.

To every woman, then, who earns her living, and to every woman who does not, we earnestly appeal, begging that she will aid in sustaining this association, either as a beneficiary or as an honorary member; for her own sake, if the benefits are of value to her, and for the sake of her sister women, if they are not.

We trust that you will read carefully this circular, and that you will induce others to read it; also, that you will do what you can to obtain names, and send them with your own, as applicants for membership.

The application should be made thus: Enclose the sum of two dollars for each person desiring to become a member, write the name and address of each plainly, and mail to the treasurer, whose name and address will be found at the end of this circular. Do not fail to state, when sending in applications, whether you wish to become a beneficiary or an honorary member; otherwise it will be impossible to know which form of certificate to send in return. All letters in reference to this subject, fulfilling the above requirements, will be promptly answered.

It is impossible in this circular to find room for any further details in regard to plan of management, or even for the table of figures upon which we base our system of work. It is due, however, to that public to whom we appeal to state that this association is protected by a code of By-Laws, which provide that the officers and the whole Board of Directors of the association shall be annually elected by the members thereof. The first annual meeting, of which the members will be duly notified, is to be called at an early date. At this meeting it is proposed to elect three ladies of integrity, position and responsibility, as trustees. In the hands of these trustees is to be placed all fees derived from certificates of beneficiary membership, which fees are, until four thousand dollars have accumulated, to be invested to accrue interest. Thus a fund will be created to meet exigencies arising from that increased death-rate which lapsing years must bring. All other moneys are taken charge of by the treasurer, and used, by order of the Board, as a working fund.

Respectfully, ALICE DUTTON.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

P. S.—Since writing the above the encouragement we have received has induced the Board of Management to take a small office at 208 Tremont Street, where please address all communications connected with the association, or call for further information. A. D.

A CASE IN POINT.

EDITOR NEW ORLEANS REPUBLICAN:—

"For lease for a term of fifty years" is the announcement on a sign-board in front of a huge building in the very heart of the business part of the "upper city," as the space within a radius of half a dozen blocks, having Magazine Market for its centre, is now called. The building referred to bears on a marble slab let into its lofty front, which towers grandly above the busy bee-hive stores and shops surrounding it, the legend, "St. Elizabeth's Asylum;" but notwithstanding its magnificence, it presents but a gloomy and unfavorable contrast to its less pretentious neighbors, for "St. Elizabeth" appears to be its only occupant, and she makes no sign of life.

Here is presented a potent argument why property belonging to even charitable associations, or which is used for charitable purposes by others than the State, should not be exempted from taxation. A space large enough for the site of a score or two of stores and workshops, in the most valuable and convenient and flourishing locality in the district, is rendered absolutely valueless,—for all useful or practical purposes is really wiped out of existence. Vast sums must have been expended to erect the really imposing structures intended as a home for the orphans; but it is now, too late, discovered that the stock of orphans falls so far below the supply of asylums that all this capital has been needlessly withdrawn from the people whom it was assisting into prosperity; and it, too, has become a dead waste.

Had this property been taxable, how different would have been the result; and St. Elizabeth's Asylum is not the only institution of the sort in this city against which the same arguments lie. Had this property been taxable, a less costly site, where no obstruction to trade could have resulted, would most probably have been selected, and an edifice commensurate with the charitable necessities of the section been built—provided, which is very likely, the projectors had not realized that there were asylums sufficient already in existence, and thus been induced to save and utilize their money. As it is, the community is greatly inconvenienced and much poorer, while not a single individual is bettered in the slightest degree.

It is not even probable that a lease can be effected, for the building is not adapted to any business or occupation, or any combination of them, at all likely to be established there. If it could be sold and remodelled into homes and shops for the class of tradesmen who make its vicinity so prosperous, it would be a positive blessing; but this can hardly be expected from the conservative customs of the society which owns it.

There seems to be no remedy for this state of affairs, except in legislation. If this property paid taxes, necessity would compel its utilization in some manner. Why not, then, pass a law taxing all property owned by church or charitable societies which may hereafter be acquired, and all which is now owned by such associations after the lapse of a given time, say in three or five years? The evil of exemption from sharing the general burden grows continually, and is too oppressive to be borne much longer. Every year sees some new combination spring into chartered life, authorized to acquire property thenceforward to remain untaxed, and while a levy is thus made upon the whole people for its maintenance, only its comparatively few members benefit by its existence. Costly churches are now being erected in various parts of the city, despite the notorious fact that each Sunday shows in nearly all of those now open for worship but a "beggarly account of empty benches."

I have no feeling in this matter other than the general weal, and therefore hope a bill will be introduced at an early day, in order that its provisions may be carefully scanned by the public as well as by the legislators. I desire it simply as a measure of reform, and wish all interests to be heard on the subject.

JUSTICE.

CHARLES SUMNER.

The community is still shocked by the sudden death of one who will be enrolled in history as one of the noblest sons of man. Well may America feel proud of counting Charles Sumner as one of her own. He gave character, glory, and renown to the people from whom he sprung, to the country which reaped the greatest benefit of his noble mind. His labors, however, belonged to humanity. His ideal was greater than that which can be circumscribed by geographical limits, and his name will be inscribed on the rolls of the great emancipators and true messiahs of the human race. The greatness of Sumner, probably, did not consist in his erudite accomplishments, in his mental grasp, in his intellectual attainments, though they were of great eminence; but in the noble qualities of heart, in his moral loftiness, his spotless virtue, the untarnished purity of his character, which alone made it possible for him to occupy that towering position of the most eminent and devoted advocate of freedom, which enabled him to stand unmoved in the midst of the contest and turmoil of partisan warfare, presenting a giant in moral strength, endowed with the fortitude of Divine justice to do battle in the name of God for his oppressed and enslaved sons.

It is needless for us to present here a lengthy biography of the late statesman, philanthropist, and scholar; the secular press has already spread before the civilized world an extensive biography of the beloved Senator; we merely desire to pay our humble tribute to the great man, who, as one of God's prophets, has added another link to Divine revelation by his life, his works, his utterances, his courage, his fidelity to the cause of justice and humanity. As he proved the friend of humanity without distinction of race or nationality, so did he prove the friend of religious liberty. It was Charles Sumner who presented the petition against the unholy machinations of the purblind fanatics who desired to make the Constitution of the United States, the magna charta of the human race, the instrument of a sect. His ideal was man, in his entirety, in his individuality, the creature that came forth from the hands of God, crowned with the royalty of God-born intellect; neither the Christian nor the Jew, the Protestant nor the Catholic, the American, the European nor the African, but the man.

As such he will live forever in the annals of human progress, of human freedom. Sumner, the man who electrified the people by his words, is dead; but his lessons, his teachings, his labors, his achievements will live to the end of days.—Jewish Times.

[For THE INDEX.]

MATERIALISM---IMMATERIAL.

If it be true we end with date of death,
Diffused through all back to those elements
From whence at birth we drew our borrowed breath,
And Nature claims us in our cerements,
Yet must we lead our little lives the same;
For dateless virtue with us does not end,
But increase hath, and added, nobler fame,
When with her life our own doth sweetly blend.
As in our mortal soil no flower can rise
Until two souls as perfect one are grown,
And thus through love their love immortalize,
So must man's godlike part remain unknown,
Unless with virtue, she that never dies,
He yoke himself, and like a bride her crown.

CRADLE SONG.

All the world is slumbering now,
None awake but only thou.
'Tis the wind is sighing drear;
Lie thee still and sleep, my dear!

Close up these two eyes so bright,
Close them up like buds at night;
When the morning sun shall glow,
Like the flowers they will blow.

I shall see those flowers fine,
I shall kiss these eyes of thine,
'Tis the same to mother then,
As if Spring were come again.

GLIMPSES.

Please send in all "Petitions" as soon as possible.

Will the Liberal Christian please accept our thanks for a very generous notice of our late lecture in Horticultural Hall?

Total number of names thus far sent on the "Congressional Petition"—4,387; total number on the "Massachusetts Petition"—8,669.

Bald Mountain and the Congregational Council are twin marvels. "What is Congregationalism?" remains still the great conundrum of the minute.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From Benj. A. Andrews, Shelburne Falls, 43 names; from N. M. Hatch, Boston, 12; from E. A. Sawtelle, Grantville, 25; from N. A. Rogers, Abington, 36. Total for the week—116 names.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From R. H. Ranney, Boston, 53 names; from E. A. Sawtelle, Grantville, Mass., 27; from N. M. Hatch, Boston, 10; from Benj. A. Andrews, Shelburne Falls, Mass., 43. Total for the week—133 names.

We find the following copied from the Congregationalist into the New York Evangelist: "Rev. Edward C. Towne, whom we once had occasion to pronounce a 'Flourens among the radicals,' has seen in part the error of his ways, and announces his return to 'loyalty to the Christ of God in Jesus.' Welcome." We do not know exactly what this means.

The one monument, above all others, which the country owes to the memory of Charles Sumner, is the passage of his Civil Rights Bill. This seems to be the spontaneous wish of all true hearts to-day. It is in vain that men try to express in words the honor they feel for the conscience that Sumner was, and stood for; acts alone can express it. Let the first of them be the solemn completion of his great work.

The church-taxation question is now vigorously agitated in New Orleans, as well as in many other places. The Daily Republican, of that city, has republished Mr. Parton's stirring paper on the subject, and had several able editorials in favor of taxing the churches. A good illustration of the uselessness and positive harmfulness of many of the existing exemptions will be found elsewhere, copied from that paper.

Here is a lesson well worth conning: "Senator Sumner never kept a carriage during his long residence in Washington, but generally walked on fine days and patronized the horse-cars in unfavorable weather. He sometimes expressed a wish to be the possessor of horses and a carriage, but would add: 'I cannot afford it. I either must give up buying books and keep a carriage, or forego the carriage and keep myself posted in literature.'"

When Faraday was asked how he could possibly believe the theological notions of the narrow sect he belonged to, he replied: "I prostrate my reason in this matter; for if I applied the same process of reasoning which I use in matters of science, I should be an unbeliever." From the beginning Christianity has required the prostration of reason, as a condition of Christian belief; and Faraday told the simple truth, when he confessed that the application of scientific reasoning to his Christian creed would have made him a disbeliever in it. But he failed to see that he would only have thrown away the guesses of an ignorant age for the sake of real knowledge.

We greatly regret that there is any occasion to give the following notice, though we give it with great willingness: "The large music publishing house of Oliver Ditson & Co., Boston, suffered from fire on Tuesday evening last, the upper part of their main building being destroyed. Although many thousands of valuable books were ruined by fire or water, their remaining stock in other buildings, and in branch stores, is quite large enough for present demands, and a large corps of printers and binders will soon supply what has been lost. A very few days' interruption of active business is all they anticipate. They have temporarily removed to No. 225 Washington Street, opposite Franklin, where they may at present be addressed."

A few hours before General Rossel, the Communist, was shot by order of the government of President Thiers, he wrote the following words to his comrades, which ought to immortalize him as one of the greatest spirits that ever met death in defence of a loved and honored cause: "I charge you, if ever the party which I have supported should come in power, and should menace their adversaries with their vengeance, to make use of this letter, to tell them that at my last hour I urgently beg of those who have the honor of defending the cause of liberty not to avenge its victims. It would be unworthy of liberty and of us who are dead.

"Your devoted L. Rossel.

"November 28, 2 1-2 A.M."

There is a beautiful truth suggested by the phrase, "sympathy of religions;" namely, the essential unity of religion under all its diverse forms. There is, however, another truth, less lovely, but equally undeniable, which might be expressed by the phrase, "antipathy of religions." That is, as shown by history, special historical religions have always shown a tendency to persecute each other. Each of these truths ought to have justice done to it. Would it not be approximately correct to say that all historical religions sympathize with each other so far as their universal elements are concerned, while they antagonize each other so far as their special claims are concerned? It is these conflicting special claims that have made all the mischief, and no stable peace can be expected till they are all alike abandoned or outgrown.

The last meeting of the Second Radical Club in this city was the best we have ever attended. Mr. Frank B. Sanborn read a paper of great suggestiveness on "Imprisonment." A young man created intense interest by avowing himself to be a discharged convict, and telling his story in the manliest way. The account he gave of maltreatment by the Charlestown State Prison officials was supported by what appeared to be irresistible evidence of its truth. He desires and is making efforts to effect a reform in the treatment of prisoners. We were more than satisfied of the disinterestedness and purity of his motives, and hope that he will accomplish all he aims at. A book is soon to be published detailing the facts of his case; and our readers will then have the opportunity of knowing more about one of the most interesting young men we have ever met.

Cosmian Hall, in Florence, Massachusetts, was dedicated on March 25 and 26. The celebration was one of the most interesting and successful ever held, as conceded by all who were present. A noble Hall, built by the radicals themselves for the service of radicalism; a free, intelligent, and united society, full of life and enthusiasm; an excellent and heartily sustained "speaker," Rowland Connor,—few places can boast of such advantages, as things go in this world. Although unable to be present till the closing session of Thursday evening was half through, we heard glowing accounts of the fine speeches, the fine audiences, and the fine spirit of the occasion. Perhaps some friend will send a little history of the proceedings; we now only mention the dedication of Cosmian Hall as one of the best free religious conventions ever held, and record our great satisfaction and pleasure at the cheerful prospects of the Free Congregational Society of Florence.

THE INJUSTICE OF CHURCH-EXEMPTION.

The seventh and last public hearing granted on the petition of the Liberal League by the Joint Special Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature on "Just and Equal Taxation" took place Thursday forenoon, March 26, in the Green Room at the State House. Both petitioners and remonstrants having been heard at length, an opportunity was then given to the former to reply to the objections brought by the latter against their petition; and the draft of a bill which would secure the desired reform was prepared and presented on behalf of the League by Mr. C. E. Pratt. It is due to the chairman and members of the Committee to acknowledge publicly the great courtesy and fairness with which the hearings have been uniformly conducted, as shown to both sides alike. The Committee will consider the question of taxation of bank stock and mortgages before making their final report. Meanwhile we submit to our readers the following sketch of an hour's speech, written out as faithfully as possible from the brief notes we made use of at the time.

Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen of the Committee:—

In replying on behalf of the Liberal League to the various arguments and objections urged by the remonstrants against the granting of our petition, I design to consider only the most important of them, and to avoid, so far as is possible, going over again ground already traversed. Permit me first to consider the case of charitable and educational institutions, and afterwards that of the churches; for the latter involves a question of conscience, which the former does not.

It has greatly surprised me that, of the numerous distinguished and eloquent gentlemen who have appeared before you to defend the exemption from taxation of the various charitable and educational institutions in which they are interested, no one has apparently taken the trouble to read the petition against which they unite to protest. Their great aim has been to prove that these institutions are all rendering valuable public services to the State, and will be either crippled or destroyed, if deprived of the State aid they now receive in being released from the burden of taxation. The petition for "just and equal taxation," however, does not propose that these institutions shall be deprived of State aid; it simply proposes to change the form of it,—to put direct appropriation in the place of tax-exemption. Consequently these able and influential gentlemen have occupied the valuable time of the Committee by urging arguments which are totally irrelevant and off the point. Their pathetic appeals in behalf of the "sick poor," and other deserving objects of public charity, might without impropriety have been deferred to some other occasion; their eloquence and ability should have been applied to a defence of the present form of State aid, as compared with the form of State aid now proposed. It is quite unnecessary for me, therefore, to devote any time to analysis of the elaborate statistics presented for consideration by the Committee. All that it is necessary to say on this head is to call the Committee's attention to the complete evasion by these gentlemen of the real point at issue. What your petitioners desire is simply this: that the system of tax-exemption be abolished, and that all applications for State aid be referred to a special Board (perhaps the Board of State Charities), before whom the applicants shall be required to establish a valid claim for the aid they seek. The advantages of this plan will, I conceive, be many and great, but I will now only specify two:—

1. It is probable that the numerous institutions which now enjoy exemption from taxation without deserving it, on a false plea of being purely charitable or educational in character, will either refrain from making application for direct appropriations or will fail to secure them. A great step will thus be taken in the direction of public economy.

2. It is equally probable that a great improvement will take place in the administration of really deserving institutions themselves. I will not specify instances; but you must all have heard of cases of a partial distribution of the benefits of these institutions, by which the poor and obscure fail to receive as good or as prompt attention as others who possess influential friends. If the Board appointed to take cognizance of all applications for State aid were to grant public hearings on the subject, failures to dispense impartially the beneficence of applicant institutions would be pretty sure to come to light; and knowledge of this fact would exercise a most salutary influence in the ordinary conduct of their affairs. The institutions would themselves be toned up to a higher fidelity and efficiency; and the public would be great gainers in consequence.

With reference to the relative advantages of tax-exemption and direct appropriation, as means of aiding purely charitable and educational institutions of a deserving character, scarcely anything has been said directly by the remonstrants against our petition. But a few incidental phrases were dropped which suggested to my mind the best that could probably be urged in defence of the existing practice.

1. Mr. Stevenson, who made a very eloquent plea on behalf of the Massachusetts General Hospital, after saying that the tax of $38,000 a year which the Hospital would be compelled to pay would oblige it either to curtail its usefulness or else go to the State for aid, added—"And we do not like to do that." Why not? Is it any more humiliating or any more undignified to urge the public usefulness of the Hospital as just ground for a direct appropriation, than it is to come here, and, on the same ground, to plead for its exemption from taxation? Is not the Hospital exactly as much a recipient of public assistance in one case as in the other? The $38,000 of taxes now escaped by the Hospital are just as truly paid by the State to-day as they would be if appropriated directly out of the State treasury. With all respect for Mr. Stevenson, I submit that nobody's "liking" or "disliking" ought to be allowed to stand in the way of a just and needed reform. His objection seems to be based on the notion that tax-exemption is no favor from the State; as if the payment of the Hospital's taxes by the whole community were not a virtual contribution to that amount towards defraying its expenses!

2. "But we shall not get so much, if obliged to go to a Board for direct appropriations." I forget whose plea suggested this as a possible objection to the plan now proposed. But the answer seems to me very clear. If a charitable institution, after making a full statement of its needs before a proper Board of reference, cannot secure a recommendation to the Legislature for so large a grant as it now receives by way of tax-exemption, then it is altogether likely that it now receives more than it ought. If it cannot get "so much" in that way, it gets too much now; and a reduction of the amount would be an act of bare justice to the public at large.

3. "But the exemption of charitable and educational institutions from taxation saves money to the State; for they do the State's work cheaper than the State itself can do it." This was the argument of several of the remonstrants. Very well: could any stronger argument be adduced before a Board of reference, as a reason for recommending appropriations equal to the full amount of the taxes from which they are now excused? If the plea is sound, and can be made to appear so, there need be no anxiety lest the State should not be inclined to adopt the most economical way of doing its own work. People will be quick enough to see their own interest in this matter; and nobody will object to direct appropriations to existing charitable institutions, if thereby the necessity of still larger outlay is obviated. The argument is an excellent one, not for perpetuating tax-exemption, but for adopting direct appropriation in its stead.

The fact is, that the people may be safely trusted to support, either privately or publicly, every honest and genuine charity that is needed. The Report of the State Treasurer for the year 1872 (the latest one as yet printed) shows an expenditure of $407,290.17 for "charitable" objects alone; and if the people refuse direct appropriations for other charities on the change of system proposed, then the wrongfulness of stealing the money from them, as now, by the blind process of tax-exemption, is self-evident. Either the people are now made to pay more than they would think right, if they knew the amount; or else they will cheerfully pay the same amount, when they do come to know it.

But the main question, whether as regards the amount of taxes involved or the principle at stake, concerns the churches. I wish to reply first to a few special arguments brought forward by the remonstrants to defend the practice of exempting the churches from taxation.

Judge Warren has urged upon your attention a specious argument which I ought not to pass over unnoticed. He declared that to tax the churches now would violate or impair an implied contract between them and the State; that the churches have been built under special inducements in the shape of a promised immunity from taxation, and that the State is now bound in good faith to fulfil its promise by perpetuating this immunity. If this were true, I should be the last one to advocate a breach of faith on the part of the State by breaking even an implied pledge of perpetual exemption. But it is not true. This exemption is now provided for by the General Statutes, not by the State Constitution; all the statutes are liable to repeal from year to year, as circumstances shall dictate; and all new enterprises are undertaken with this well understood risk of repeal. There is no implied promise on the part of the State to preserve the statutes as they are, unchanged and unchangeable; on the contrary, they are continually modified to meet the demands of progress. To hold that any such contract exists as Judge Warren alleges would be to tie the Legislature hand and foot, in every possible direction; not merely with reference to the churches, but also with reference to every other enterprise undertaken under a given state of things. Laws are made and unmade; charters are granted and revoked; legislative changes of all sorts are continually effected, as the public interests require. To tax the churches now would no more violate or impair a supposed contract with them than to raise the rate of taxation would violate or impair a supposed contract with other parties that had made investments under a lower rate. The ground taken is wholly untenable in equity and common sense; and, though I am no lawyer, I cannot imagine that the Legislature should consider itself incapacitated to reform the statutes, whenever it perceives that they are capable of improvement.

Judge Warren also argued that Article II. of the Constitution confers the right to tax the whole community, unbelievers included, in order to aid the churches, by exemption from taxation. It reads thus: "It is the right as well as the duty of all men in society, publicly, and at stated seasons, to worship the Supreme Being, the great Creator and Preserver of the universe." He maintained that this declaration of the "duty" of all persons gives the right to tax them for the support of public worship. Now twenty-three of the States, by express provision in their Constitutions, declare that no one shall be compelled to support or maintain public worship in any society of which he is not a member; and Massachusetts, though it has no such provision in its Constitution, has it in the sixtieth chapter of the General Statutes. Allow me to read a brief extract from Tyler's American Ecclesiastical Law, which, I am informed, is a standard work on the subject. Referring to the time of the Revolution, Tyler says:—

"The parish consisted of a definite tract of land, the metes and bounds of which were very exact; and the poll parish was made up of individuals. The meeting-house and minister, and the parsonage, were all provided for and sustained by a tax on each inhabitant according to his property; and the inhabitants were required to attend the preaching provided for them under penalties prescribed by law. . . . All landholders, resident and non-resident, Christian and unchristian, were taxed, though they never saw the minister or entered the meeting-house; and all corporations holding lands within the parish were also taxed, upon the principle that, so far as the community were concerned, public religious and moral instruction was intended for the prevention of crimes, and not the salvation of souls." [page 177.]

Observe the principle here alleged as justifying the direct taxation of all for the support of public worship; namely, the good moral influence of the churches. Now this practice of direct taxation for religious worship was abolished by the people of Massachusetts, and the Constitution was amended accordingly, on November 11, 1833; and the principle on which it rested was consequently declared invalid and false. Hence Tyler declares that now "no citizen is liable to pay a tax for the support of public worship, or other parish charges, to a society other than that of which he is a member." [page 182.] Yet this very principle that citizens may be compelled to support the churches because of their good moral influence, which was so emphatically condemned by the State in 1833, and overthrown as a justification for direct taxation, is still pleaded by the remonstrants as a valid justification for indirect taxation in the form of church-exemption. This pretended principle is their only plausible excuse for such exemption; yet it has been already condemned as invalid and false by the people of the State. Judge Warren himself, when questioned, was obliged to confess that support of the churches is now purely voluntary; yet by this confession he contradicted flatly his previous assertion that the State had the right to enforce it as a "duty." The simple truth is that, if the argument of "good moral influence" is any justification for indirect taxation in support of the churches, it is just as good an argument for direct taxation for the same object; and the remonstrants might as well demand a return to the exploded system of the past. But if this is absurd, then there is no logical escape from the necessity of abolishing church-exemption from taxation now.

Another argument in remonstrance against the petition, offered by Professor Lincoln, of Newton Theological Seminary, and Rev. Mr. Dickinson, of South Boston, was to the effect that churches, being unproductive property, were capital, and not revenue; and Adam Smith was quoted to show that political economy teaches to tax revenue alone. In refutation of this position it will be sufficient simply to quote from John Stuart Mill, a more modern and higher authority:—

"To provide that taxation shall fall entirely on income, and not at all on capital, is beyond the power of any system of fiscal arrangement. There is no tax which is not partly paid from what would otherwise have been saved; no tax, the amount of which, if remitted, would be wholly employed in increased expenditure, and no part whatever laid by as an addition to capital. All taxes, therefore, are in some sense partly paid out of capital; and in a poor country it is impossible to impose any tax which will not impede the increase of the national wealth. But in a country where capital abounds, and the spirit of accumulation is strong, this effect of taxation is scarcely felt." [Political Economy, Book V., chapter II., § 7.]

But I will consume no more of your time with replies to arguments which doubtless appeared to you in their true light at the time. There are some considerations, however, which ought not to be left untouched in committing our case finally into your hands.

Rev. Mr. Dickinson, as may be remembered, inquired—"What is the real animus of this petition?" He then proceeded to answer his own inquiry by declaring that the petition had its origin either in "avarice," in a sordid and mercenary spirit which begrudged support to the cause of religion, or else in "mere, sheer, ribald, low-lived infidelity." I deny both of these charges.

"Avarice" had nothing to do with the origin of this petition; or any other mean or mercenary motive. We care nothing for the amount of the tax indirectly levied upon us by the exemption of the churches from their fair share of the common burden; it is the fact of the tax against which we protest—the assumed right to tax us for the support of religious societies in which we are not members, contrary to the whole tenor and spirit of the laws of the State. The dollar a year which every poll in Massachusetts, on the average, is compelled to pay towards the support of the churches, in consequence of their evasion of all taxation, is extorted from us in violation of well-recognized rights of conscience; and the whole movement is a protest against the violation of these rights. There is no question of conscience with reference to charitable and educational institutions; but there is a question of conscience with reference to the churches. This indirect tax of a dollar a year is a grievance, an act of oppression, a great wrong; we protest against it, and appeal to the Legislature for redress. Our forefathers were aggrieved and went to war, protesting against the right to tax unjustly arrogated by Lord North and George the Third, although the amount of the tax was only a few pence on a pound of tea; and last December we all celebrated the stern resistance of the Tea-Spillers to this trivial tax, because they saw tyranny even in a trifle. The protest we make is the same in kind. The churches have no right to tax us, even to the amount of a cent, whether they do it directly or indirectly. The tax is a grievance and an injustice, an infringement of our right to be freed from enforced tributes to a religion which is not ours; and this, not "avarice," is the cause of our petition.

The cry of "infidelity" has been raised, not only by Mr. Dickinson, but also by Father Healey and Mr. P. A. Collins. I have no counter-cry to raise in return—no recriminations to make by way of retaliation. It is enough to say that this is not, as alleged, an "infidel movement." It is a movement for simple justice, shared by many church-members as well as non-church-members,—in fact, by all who can discern the great wrong involved in church-exemption. A single petition from the city of Newburyport had 854 signatures, including the names of seven ministers; and many other ministers have joined in the protest. Many religious journals of high reputation, such as the Congregationalist, the Christian Era, the Independent, and others, have also joined in it. It is the manifestation of a widespread and rapidly growing public sentiment, not only in Massachusetts, but in all parts of the country. Our own petition originated with the Boston Liberal League, an organization formed about a year ago for the purpose of securing a more complete realization of the American idea of the separation of Church and State, and now numbering about one hundred and seventy members.

This League has printed and scattered thousands of tracts through the State, and sent out blank petitions which have been returned with 8,553 signatures, already presented in the House of Representatives. The whole movement is an honest one for a positive idea—the complete abolition of a practice that is a glaring violation of the rights of conscience.

I affirm most emphatically that this movement is not, as alleged, a "raid on religion," a "conflict between religion and irreligion," an "infidel movement." I do not argue this point with you; for, if it were an "infidel movement," you believe that even infidels have rights, and mean to protect them. For one, I have my own religion, very dear to me; and it is none the less entitled to protection because it may not be yours. What it is, is my concern alone; I do not come here to thrust it upon you, but to ask that its rights be respected. I ask to be relieved from the injustice of being indirectly taxed for the support of a religion that is not mine. The direct tax of 1830 is the indirect tax of 1874—an enforced charity exacted by the churches from all alike, including the "unbelievers." I protest against it, and rest my protest on naked, eternal justice.

Let me be perfectly open with you: the only thing I deprecate is a compromise. If you cannot recommend such a measure as shall establish the principle we contend for,—if you cannot bring in a bill which shall abolish all exemption of the churches from taxation,—then send us back to appeal once more to the country, and to rouse such a public opinion as shall secure the reform we seek. Do not exempt in part and tax in part, as has been proposed. I should welcome a fair and square defeat, but not a compromise. For the cause we plead must go on; if defeated to-day, we shall succeed to-morrow. But a compromise would leave the wrong unredressed. Whatever you do, I respectfully request you to meet fully and frankly the point of conscience; and I rest my case on justice alone.

THE NEEDLEWOMAN:

A VISION OF PRAYER IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY OF CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION.

"Yesterday morning, the police of the —— precinct discovered the remains of a young woman in a tenement house on —— Street, immediately in the rear of —— Church, who had evidently perished from privation and want. Some unfinished needle-work by her side showed that she had toiled to the last. It is thought that she fell from her seat too much exhausted to make herself heard, and died unwept and uncared for."—N. Y. Paper.

I.

On my table there lay all the news of the day,
And I had been busily reading
What the papers could say was now out of the way,
Or tell that was worth the heeding;
Till my heart sadly bled, as with sorrow I read
Of death from starvation fearful:
In deep anguish and dread, that a woman had plead
For succor, with eyelids tearful,
And that, wanting but bread, she was now lying dead!
Unheeded her moaning,
Her sobbing and groaning,
Now past all atoning;
Shrouded in gloom by a grim church wall,
Serving her now for a funeral pall.

II.

Then my fancy took flight, and I witnessed the sight,—
Deep awe with my sorrow blending,—
As she prayed through the night for the coming of light,
Though day brought to toil no ending.
For while bread was so dear, she restrained every tear,
And firmer each nerve exerted,
With a horrible fear, as the evening grew near,
Of sinking, by strength deserted,
Into shadows more drear than were those drawing near.
Though sinking and wasting,
Her sewing and basting
With speed she was hast'ning,
Ere the deep shades of the night should fall,
Rendered more dark by the drear church wall.

III.

While each minute seemed wealth, she could pause not for breath,
Her brain though with fever reeling;
More important than health, she was racing with Death,
Whose steps were still nearer stealing.
Still the shadows grew deep, seeming fairly to leap
Where dimly the day still lingers,
But she paused not to weep, nor shut eyelids in sleep,
For closer her trembling fingers
To their labor must keep, their harvest to reap.
Despairingly cowering,
She saw demons glowering,
Where shadows were lowering;
While darker still loomed the grim church wall,
Quenching all hope where its shadows fall.

IV.

With her heart filled with fear, she saw day disappear,
But leave her the demons raving;
Then she prayed God might hear and the Savior draw near,
For sorely she needed saving;
But the neighboring bell, with a musical swell,
Rang out with a bodeful ringing,
Till the sound seemed to dwell in her ears as it fell,
A horrible feeling bringing
That no prayer could dispel,—it was striking her knell,
And it brought from their hiding
The shadows, abiding
Like devils deriding
Her prayerful confiding,
Laughing in scorn at her anguished call,
Echoing back from the bleak church wall.

V.

Then she sprang from her chair with wild cries of despair,—
Her limbs in their weakness reeling,—
And fell prostrate in prayer, while still rang through the air
The clang of the bell appealing,
To invite from the street the faithful to meet,
Their thanks to the Lord returning,
And each other to greet, as they rise from their seat,
Not knowing the sad heart-burning
Over work incomplete, within sound of their feet;
No suppliant seeming
To be dimly dreaming
That agonized screaming,
Such as, once heard, would their hearts appal,
Ominous fell on the black church wall.

VI.

What if virtue remain free from blemish or stain,
If prayers were such answers bringing,
As were burning her brain with the mocking refrain
That dwelt in this bodeful ringing?
Why this burden of care? She was youthful and fair!
Her soul, from the thought rebelling,
Was too noble to dare to sin's courses repair,
That demons were darkly telling:
If forsaken in prayer, she must die in despair.
Is prayer unavailing?
Must wrong be prevailing,
And virtue lie quailing
In anguish and wailing?—
Wailings unheeded because they fall
On the cold stones of the black church wall!

VII.

From the vision I turned, but a lesson had learned,
Of justice as well as pity:
In my being it burned, till, no more unconcerned,
I trod through the crowded city.
As the zephyrs that blow may to hurricanes grow,
And toss us all torn and bleeding,—
As the streamlet so slow may in torrents yet flow,
And mock at our mournful pleading,—
The justice we owe let us quickly bestow:
Ere, past all concealing
Or hushing or healing,
A deadlier feeling
Light flames, roaring skywards with frenzied call,
That shall crumble to ashes the grim church wall.

THE MORAL THEORY OF EXCHANGES.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I must still dissent from the position you have taken, both in replying to Mr. Heberling, and to my own communication printed in THE INDEX of March 5; and I hope I have something to say which will make another "manifesto" not altogether a trespass upon your good nature.

You assert that the cost principle "rests on another principle back of itself;" but if it be, as you well state it, the principle of "exchanging equivalents for equivalents," upon what does it rest save man's native sense of justice? Is it just that more shall be given for less,—something for nothing? Is it just that another shall work for me while I sit idle, or that he shall yield to me the fruits of his labor, and receive in return something of less value? These questions seem to admit of ready response, and upon their answer—without going back to the right of holding property—the principle of exchanging equivalents for equivalents must stand or fall.

Some confusion has evidently arisen from the supposition that the advocates of this principle either deny that things have an intrinsic value, or that such a value can be made the subject of bargain and sale. But they are not so shallow as this would make them appear. They know the difference between a diamond and a brickbat, and never expect the time to come when an exchange of the one for the other will be an exchange of equivalents. But their word "cost" covers all the difference between them. Mr. Warren's favorite expression is "sacrifice for sacrifice." All that is sacrificed in the production of an article, together with all that is sacrificed in parting with it (if anything), makes up its real cost and legitimate price in the market. The sacrifice made in parting with a diamond covers whatever worth it may have to the seller; and you will perceive a vast difference between charging for the value a thing has for yourself and what it has for another. In most instances a production is made expressly to sell, and parting with it involves no sacrifice. But even the labor-cost, which you insist is the whole cost, will measure values more accurately than you seem to suppose. The average labor-cost of finding diamonds, compared with that of producing brickbats, is perhaps nearly as much greater as the price.

Now the advocates of the cost principle simply mean that whatever is added to the real cost, i.e., to the sacrifice involved in making and parting with an article, is wrongful and extortionate, and is just so much wrung from the needs or weakness of others.

They mean that the practice of buying and selling for profit, which does not add to the real value of commodities, but enhances their market value fifty or one hundred per cent., is unjust and oppressive. They mean that the merchant ought to be paid for his services to the community, not what he can extort from the community, but what his services are worth in effecting exchanges.

The present system amounts to just this: that the productions of the laboring classes are subjected to so large a toll by the "middle men" through whose hands they pass that, while the latter have an abundance, and may easily store up for the future, the laborer gets scarce enough for his daily needs, and finds it very difficult to accumulate anything for a "rainy day."

The farmer must have something beside his wheat, and is compelled to exchange it for other productions. Of these productions he ought to receive back an amount the value of which, added to the actual cost of the exchange, should balance the value of the wheat he has parted with. At present he gets nothing of the sort; for the agent acquires wealth, while he remains poor.

You complain that the "cost principle" lacks a "criterion of the real cost of labor;" but this is the very last thing one could desire it to have. Its advocates are seeking no legislative enactment that shall fix the real cost of labor; nor do they expect the general adoption of any criterion whereby one may compel another to conform to his scale of prices. They only hope to show men that it is for their self-interest to make the cost of their own production as small as possible, and to bring its price to the lowest notch. They hope to convince men that the law of supply and demand means, Get all you can, and give as little as may be; and that, in the scramble which results, the rights of the weaker classes are unavoidably trodden under foot.

Having taught men this, they rely upon their native sense of justice for the adoption of a fairer system; and upon their good common sense to perceive that, under a right method of effecting exchanges, to cheapen the price of one commodity will be to cheapen all; just as raising the price of one to-day raises all; and that, therefore, the only criterion needed for the cost of labor would be that each should strive to make it as small as possible.

It has been hoped that THE INDEX might help to educate men in this direction; and a chosen few, indeed, still cherish the expectation.

I have taken less pains to defend the position taken in my former letter than to put before you the real meaning of the "cost principle" as understood by its advocates; a meaning which you seem hitherto to have missed. But I still maintain, nevertheless, that the cost principle, as applied to exchanges, has so little to do with property-right that the discussion of the one is utterly foreign to the consideration of the other; and though in saying this I deal somewhat in assertion, I still remain A QUESTIONER.

[As our correspondent shows so eminently fair and truth-loving a spirit, and cares less to defend his former position than to commend his principles to candid consideration, we think it but right to forbear all criticism until we can snatch leisure to give them an independent treatment, at greater length than is here possible. It is our hope by-and-by to state the theory of Mr. Warren as he himself presents it, and then to express such views as it naturally suggests to our own mind. As an attempt to ground all exchange-transactions on moral ideas rather than on private greed, no lover of his race can fail to be profoundly interested in it; and what we have seen and read of its advocates has given us great sympathy with their fundamental purpose.—ED.]

PEACE OF MIND.

PASSAIC, N. J., March 17, 1874.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—It is natural for us to welcome cordially a friend whose views agree with ours, and therefore THE INDEX just at hand gave us pleasure.

I was particularly interested in the letter of "T. W. H." about "The Christian Name," and agree with him that it "would not be honest to call myself Christian, though it might save some trouble and some loss of popularity or profit."

THE INDEX was to some of my New York acquaintances like an earthquake, by reason of the shock its "platform" gave them. And here in Passaic I doubt if any other family would welcome the paper at all.

A friend tells me, if we lose the Christian Church, we shall become in time savages, and adds: "You are better than the average liberal."

To this I reply that he overestimates my goodness, and is in error in calling any one a true "liberal" who merely calls himself such, to cover ill deeds.

Am I not right, that a true "liberal," by his very freedom from religious slavery, has a more enduring peace of mind than the most earnest Christian can possibly attain to? Yours truly,

—— ——.

[Yes. To be emancipated from slavery of the mind is to be emancipated from fear. He whose liberalism is not mere disbelief of old superstitions, but positive obedience to eternal truths, wins a serenity of spirit which nothing on the earth, above it, or below it, can shake. However the surface of his life may be affected by untoward circumstances, its depths are safe from all disturbance. There is no peace of mind to be compared with that which grows out of unreserved self-surrender to the true and the right.—Ed.]

WHAT IS MEANT BY "AGRARIANISM."

The word agrarian is derived from the Latin ager, a field. The agrarian laws of Rome simply prohibited any citizen from acquiring more than a certain limited quantity of land. That is the only meaning the word has, unless the misuse of a word changes its meaning. It has no reference to dividing any kind of property. It simply prohibits the controlling of more land than is needed by any one, in order that all may have as much as they need. The landlord's title-deed is founded upon conquest—robbery and murder; and there can be no object in controlling more than one needs, except it be for power over his fellows, to compel unwilling service or slavery. Any title to land based upon any other foundation than occupation and use is a fraud, and has for its object injustice and oppression. To be a rightful lord of the land, one must have a commission from the maker of the land; all other commissions are spurious.

Man cannot live a moment without the four primal elements of Nature—sunlight, air, water, and land. The last named has the greater importance, as it controls access to the others, and is the only one which is susceptible of monopoly. They are not the product of man, therefore not rightfully subject to the laws of property. They form an integral part of his being, and therefore his right to them, like his right to life, is inalienable. One has no better right to control more than his share of these elements than he has to own the bodies belonging to others. It is evident that each person ought to have all the land he needs for occupation and cultivation, and no more. Given the monopoly of more, he has despotic power; denied his right to that, he is in the condition of a slave.

These elements are abundant for all, if properly regulated. There is land enough within the present boundaries of the United States for every person on earth, who now lives by cultivating land, to have about forty acres, leaving Canada, Mexico, South America, Europe, Asia, Africa, and the isles of the sea, for future expansion. Yet it is all placed beyond the reach of the toiling millions, through the cunning devices of the few, who thereby control and render these millions powerless for resistance to their will, to work as many hours and for as little pay as it pleases them to offer. Nothing but placing the land within their reach will liberate them from that control, which can only be done by limiting the quanity that any one may acquire.

Man will then be truly free—politically, religiously, and in the choice of employment. He will be thrown upon his own responsibility—to work and become affluent, or to be idle and poor.

Do the people desire right and justice to prevail? Then they should favor agrarian laws. Do they wish to protect the right to property? Then they should cease to confound the right to the possession of property with the right to produce property. All property is the product of muscle and mind, and no one has a just claim for that which he has had no agency in producing. All should have an equal right to the opportunity for producing, without being required to pay for that opportunity. The right to this opportunity secured to all, many will, from choice, become farmers who now follow other callings from necessity. These employments will thus be relieved from their surplus labor; over-production will cease, and every kind of business will assume its normal status. Labor and its compensation will be more equally distributed; true manhood, dignity, and freedom will fulfil humanity's aspirations, and man will become in truth a sovereign. O man! be just for the sake of justice, and the satisfaction will be yours that human progress has resulted from your obedience to the God within your own soul; and your reward will be great and lasting! Alanson Freeman.

A WOMAN'S ARGUMENT FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr Editor:—

Your correspondent "P.," in The Index, March 5, in an article entitled "Irredeemable Ballots," says: "Women are not taxed; it is property that is taxed." Yet, in the next paragraph, he twice declares that men are taxed, and also that foreigners are taxed. What does he mean, since he has before said that property is taxed, not women? That being conceded, I should say (to be consistent) men are not taxed; it is their property that is taxed. Did he forget himself, when he spoke of men being taxed, instead of their property?

Again: "Taxes and suffrage have nothing at all to do with each other." I should think they had something to do with each other, for a man in this State cannot vote till he has paid his taxes, even if he has nothing but a poll tax; and if the paltry sum of $3.00 entitles him to vote, why not let women vote who pay taxes on thousands of dollars of property? Why should not even poor women also vote, after having paid $3.00 for their head?

Again: "Taxation does not give or imply representation in any case. Property is taxed without being represented. We tax foreigners for many millions without giving them a vote." All very true, because they are not citizens; they do not reside here. If the owner of the property is a man, he can vote when he gains a residence; if the owner is a woman, she is never represented by a vote, whether she is a resident or not. Men have a right to vote, property or no property, if they pay for their head; women have no right to vote, no matter how much property they may possess. Hence, under the present law, if every dollar of property in the United States was owned by the women, not one of them could vote; but every man who is a citizen and naturalized, by paying a poll tax of $3.00, could vote the money of these women away just as he pleased, and women would be compelled to submit. Is that right, or would that be right? Yet that is just what these three-dollar poll-tax-payers are doing with every woman's money in the land!

Again: "Taxation and protection do go together." That is, the property of women on which they have paid taxes is protected the same as if they had voted, while "she is never called upon to protect that property." Let me ask "P." if only men protect life, liberty, and property? Ask the women who labored during the great rebellion to protect all three if they were not called upon by the necessities of the hour to protect and suffer too? Does he think that quelling a mob, and shouldering a musket for the battle-field, is the only way to protect life, liberty, and property? Woman's whole life is but a series of protections for the three. She furnishes the first, inspires the second, and protects the third, by preserving or earning it; and yet "P." argues that "the male vote represents all the force there is in the State." There are women, let me tell him, who would effect more with a broomstick than some of these three-dollar poll-tax-payers would with a musket. Yet he compares woman to greenbacks, because "there is no intrinsic value in a piece of paper," and "the ballot is effective only as it represents and is redeemable, if necessary, in force." Since "the whole vote of the women would add nothing to that force, and for State purposes would be utterly worthless," he concludes, "election lies with the men." It is because woman has been rejected, and brute force relied upon instead of moral and intellectual wisdom, that we have our Crédit Mobiliers, our corrupt legislation, our wars, and the general anarchy that now threatens the very heart of our republic morally, as did slavery once the nation politically.

THE BASIS OF MORALS.

Tippecanoe City, Ohio, March 22, 1874.

I was more than pleased with Mr. Abbot's lecture on "Scientific Ethics" published in a late number of The Index. Some parts of it need explanation, or perhaps I did not understand such parts. The conclusion summed up in the following question and answer to my mind is irresistible: "What causes the 'inseparable association' of certain ideas, and not of others—what accounts for the necessary character of any intuition whatever?" "The action of the environment reflecting its necessary relations in human intelligence." This "necessary relation" in the nature of things is the foundation of and makes morals (and I would add religion too) a science. Such have been my reflections and opinions for more than forty years.

Permit me to add that all science is founded on similar relations. Take the science of mathematics, and for illustration take the forty-seventh problem, which affirms that the squares described on the sides containing the right angle are equal to the square described on the side subtending said angle. This is affirmed of all right-angled triangles. Now it is true, intuition might reach this fact; but it would form no real foundation for science to stand on. Experience might come to the same conclusion, but it would not have the objective certainty required by science. Now science steps in between intuition and experience, and demonstrates the truth of the proposition beyond a possible doubt, showing that the truth lies deep in the nature of things. Moral truths, as Mr. Abbot has shown, lie deep in the nature of things, and will bear and should be subject to scientific investigation. But if any man suffers himself to build a structure of morals on religion, such structure will be full, most likely, of fatal defects, and unable to stand scientific investigation. He had better build no such structure as a permanent residence, for it will not stand the storms, rains, and winds of inquiry.

Here let me ask, What moves the will? Is it not "the action of the environment reflecting its necessary relations" upon it? And can it act any more freely than such "necessary relations" will permit?

FREE DISCUSSION IN BOSTON.

Mr. Editor:—

The article in your issue of Feb. 5, on "Free Sunday Meetings in Boston," contains a number of very grave errors; and, as they do injustice both to the living and the dead, I must ask of you space for the following statements. I do this the more readily, as I was Secretary of what I suppose to have been the first organized movement in Boston for the maintenance of a perfectly free meeting, such as has been perpetuated under the name of the "Sunday Institute." This term had some years before been used for designating similar meetings in Philadelphia; and it was natural enough for the friends of free discussion to adopt it here. Since the days of that persecuted man, Abner Kneeland, the "People's Meeting" had been held irregularly in Boston; but I am not aware that any free meeting, now in existence in the city of Boston can show a record beyond that of the Sunday Institute; and this did not "spring up from the ashes of a modern spiritual brotherhood," as is affirmed by "R. B." The Sunday Institute "sprang up" from a movement inaugurated by Dr. LaRoy Sunderland, twenty-two years ago, as I am here prepared to show:—

Quincy, Feb. 5, 1874.

Dear Hardy:—

The constitution of "the Original," out of which the Sunday Institute has grown, you will find in a paper I send you. That "declaration" I drew up myself; and, as you will see, it had nothing to do with spiritualism any more than it had with modern Burkism. The platform was free, and all questions brought regularly before the meeting could be freely discussed; and whenever the question of spiritualism came up, no one ever had more to say upon it, or misstated the facts more, than "R. B." Dr. C. F. Waters was Corresponding Secretary, but I do not know whether he is living or not.

Yours truly,

LaRoy Sunderland.

Here is the constitution, above referred to, which was published in Dr. Sunderland's paper of Nov. 15, 1852:—

BOSTON CIRCLE OF ORIGINALS.

This Circle was formed in this city on the evening of October 17, 1852, in a meeting of some one hundred men and women who were present on the occasion.

The belief by which its members are united, together, with their object, and the means by which they are pledged to its accomplishment, may be seen from their "Declaration" and "By-Laws," which read as follows:—

DECLARATION.

Creed—Individual Sovereignty, the True Doctrine of Manhood.

Design — Progression, Development, Universal Harmony.

Method—Associations, Lectures, Discussions. The Unrestricted Investigation of whatever appertains to Theology, Philosophy, and Science, Past, Present, and Future.

Authority—Superior Goodness, Justice, Wisdom, Reason.

Terms—This Circle is open to all persons who are attracted to its public meetings by their Love of Originality of Thought, in respect to the Essence, Form, and Use of All Things. Any person may become a member by signing this Declaration.

The Sunday Meeting thus organized commenced in Hanover Street; it afterwards moved to Cochituate Hall, Phillips Place, and thence to Chapman Hall. After a few years, as it was held on Sunday, it took the name of Philadelphia Meeting; and was advertised as "The Sunday Institute." But originally it had nothing more to do with the Mystic Rap than "R. B." himself has now to do with it.

RENOVATION OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

Editor of The Index:—

The exemption of ecclesiastical property from taxation is claimed on the ground that the churches are schools of public morals, open and free to all. Conceding for the purposes of my argument the validity of this deduction from the assumed premise, I venture to call for the proof of the assumption. Are all churches, ex vi termini, schools of public morals? If so, why not endow them from the public treasury, as we do our hospitals and seminaries? It is precisely because this assumption is a matter of dispute that the Constitution forbids such endowment, and exemption from taxation therefore indirectly violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. But the arrogance of the claim of exemption from taxation is slight, when compared with that of a church claiming to hold property from the State under a disputed title, and pleading the statute of limitations in bar of a recovery; thus inculcating by example the morality of taking possession of State lands under a deed from an agent without authority, which deed is repudiated by the State, and pleading possession under such entry as its source of title. Is a church of this persuasion a school of public morality, entitled to exemption?

That such is the morality practically taught by Trinity Church, in the city of New York, is evident from our public records, and is clearly demonstrated by the following opinions of the late Judge Conkling, Charles Tracy, &c. Old Trinity is now rated at $100,000,000, which really belongs to the school fund, and would now be devoted to a renovated public instruction, if our legislators and judges were as independent and intelligent as the late Judge Conkling.

As our regents are about to assume the supreme control of our system of education, perhaps we may indulge the hope and belief that they will not only renovate the method of instruction, but also provide the ways and means for elevating the standard of education from theology to real science. This may be done in either of two ways. The morality taught by old Trinity may be renovated and elevated to the scientific standard; or the State may resume the "King's Tavern" as Queen Anne did, and the regents of the university may then reënter and reorganize upon a moral basis adapted to the times and country in which we live.

If the churches generally would coöperate with old Trinity in this change of base, the people might well afford to exempt them all from taxation, and even to endow them all. With one accord, all would shout amen, and hail with joy the real advent of "peace on earth and good-will among men."

Respectfully, Rutger B. Miller.

Utica, N. Y.

"I don't believe much in the Bible," said a collegian to an old Quaker. "Does thee believe in France?" "Yes, I do. I never saw it, but I have plenty of proof that there is such a country." "Then thee does not believe anything unless thee or thy reliable friends have seen it?" "No, be sure I won't." "Did thee ever see thy own brains?" "No." "Did thee ever know anybody that has seen thy brains?" "No." "Does thee believe thee has any brains?"

"Tickets, sir!" said a conductor at a railway terminus in the city to a gentleman who, having been a season-ticket holder for some time, believed his face was so well known that there was no need for him to show his ticket. "My face is my ticket," replied the gentleman, a little annoyed. "Indeed!" said the conductor, rolling back his wristband and displaying a most powerful fist. "Well, my orders are to punch all tickets passing on this platform."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. JUST PUBLISHED.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. I vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

BUST OF
THEODORE PARKER,
BY
SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

"WE ARE sinning when we think we are," one says. A deep and instructive suggestion is that. The real sinner is known only to himself.

DR. LIVINGSTONE did not succeed in penetrating to the heart of Africa; but in Africa he left his own heart, which was taken from his body by his followers, and buried under a tree.

MR. BEECHER says: "I think there is nothing in the life of a man which so rouses and stirs him as love." Yes, but a good deal depends upon what he loves; for—

> "Whatsoe'er thou lovest, that become thou must;
> God if thou lovest God, dust if thou lovest dust."

R. H. DANA, JR., in writing of politics, says: "The people are deeply stirred. They are harnessing themselves for a moral crusade." We sincerely hope this is true. Never was there a greater need, in this country, of "a moral crusade" in politics than now.

POLITICS are in a hopeless state of corruption, and politicians are hopelessly corrupt. Both of the dominant parties ought to be crushed, and the people should resume the power which they have so long unwisely committed to a professional class of "rulers."

WENDELL PHILLIPS says: "Aristocracy is like a frigate splendidly built, its spar tapered to the heavens, its mast and its shroud perfect; nothing but the storm that will make the ocean kiss the sky can sink it. Democracy is like a raft where every man's foot is wet, but he cannot sink."

THERE ARE about 8,400 school-teachers in Massachusetts. The average monthly wages of the men is $85.09; of the women, $32.39. The men teachers are more than twice as well paid as the women; whether they do more than twice as good work may be considered perhaps doubtful.

STARR KING says: "The genius of Plato was naturally evolved from the capacities of the Pelasgic race." Of course; everything comes by natural evolution. And we may say, therefore, that the wonderful religious genius of Jesus was naturally evolved from the capacities of the Hebrew race.

"MR. SUMNER was a solitary man," says a writer in the Christian Union. Solitary as to society he may have been; but he had the companionship of great thoughts, ideas, and principles, as conveyed to him by books, pictures, statuary, and a few wise friends. And, after all, what society is so good as that which comes thronging to one out of the region of the inspired intellect and the aspiring soul?

ANNA DICKINSON, in her lecture on the "Social Evil," speaking of the mistaken way in which many women approach and try to reform the erring sisterhood, says, in her vigorous way: "I tell you, my friends, you have got to put down your ladyhood, and in one sense your Christianity, and walk into the room simply a plain, straightforward, kindly-disposed woman, if you ever come to reach one such soul as that!"

"WE GOVERN our passions," remarks a moral philosopher; "but in general we let the passions first have a trial." And why not? Every passion is a part of the man—natural, and God-ordained. Every passion, also, has its individual rights, which are limited only by every other passion, appetite, and desire of the whole man. Our nature is a democracy, not an aristocracy. A man as wise as St. Paul has said, speaking of the human body, that one member should not despise another, but that each should receive due honor.

IT HAS BEEN written by some one that "one half of mankind mar life, and the other half are marred by life." The real art worth knowing is the art of right living, so that we may neither mar nor be marred by the life that is ours. But, in fact, the "marring" which occurs both to life and to those who live it bears a very different appearance when looked at from the standpoint of eternity from what it does when looked at from the standpoint of time. It is the long view that best explains the "evil" in the world, not the short view.

AT A RECENT regular Monday meeting of the New York Methodist ministers, Rev. J. M. Buckley created a sensation among the brethren by saying that the attempt to make out the Bible a total-abstinence book was utterly hopeless; since it nowhere prohibited a temperate indulgence in wine or other strong drink. Mr. Buckley, we believe, is right. It is altogether unsafe to attempt to base any specific "reform" on the Bible, inasmuch as texts and examples may be quoted from that venerable book to sustain almost any belief or practice which anybody is disposed to endorse.

MR. BEECHER says of the Council that was convened to try his church, that "it was called under extraordinary circumstances which would vitiate the decision of any court on earth. It was not 'packed' but 'picked.'" He thinks that, "on the whole, the history and result of the Council constitute a practical vindication of Plymouth Church as a Congregational church. The declared purpose was to excommunicate that church. . . . The fact of failure is more significant than all the explanations of it that can be offered." Mr. Beecher would seem to be quite satisfied with the result of this attempted trial of his church.

A FRENCH AUTHOR, M. Guyard, has said: "I think that an idea, in order to bear fruit, must have a father and a mother. Hitherto, ideas have had fathers only." But have not ideas, hitherto, borne some fruit, notwithstanding their one-sided parentage? The two parts of the Frenchman's statement do not hang together; one or the other needs a little modification. We believe it is true, so far, that men have been the great originators, the great creators, of thought; that the great systems of philosophy, ethics, theology, science, have had their birth in the male and not the female mind. And it is very interesting to consider what and how much this suggests; whether it suggests a real and ineradicable generic difference between the intellects of men and women, or only a difference of social condition, which, when removed, will show woman to be as great a creator in the intellectual world as man.

WE HAVE the truest sympathy with and respect for those whose active benevolence leads them to engage in enterprises for feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick and imprisoned; for such distressing exigencies lie in our immediate pathway, and must not be overlooked. And yet we cannot help wishing that more attention might be paid to the causes of poverty and crime, and some wise measures be invented for removing those causes. All our religion and our civilization thus far have failed to bring about a true society, a real commonwealth; but at present we have antagonistic classes, clashing interests, and unfair competitions: the rich are growing richer, the poor poorer, and the yawning chasm between social castes is daily widening and deepening. Among all our other sciences, what perhaps we most need is a true social science, which shall discover and proclaim the laws and principles upon which a harmonious society must be based, and point out the way whereby the long delayed reconciliation between the individual and the community may be secured.

"The Land of the White Elephant."

A LECTURE ON BURMAH,

DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF ST. LOUIS, MARCH 15, 1874.

BY R. A. SKUES,

(Late of the Sixty-Ninth British Regiment).

At a time like this, when communication is so easy between all parts of the world, people are not likely to believe any preposterous story, either about a country or its people, as no one in his senses would venture on playing the rôle of Baron Münchhausen except in a burlesque. Still there are a great many things which an observant man sees and treasures in his memory, which are of such interest as may well be laid before those who have not an opportunity of visiting the country that he is describing.

What I am going to tell you is simply my mite, and as such you must value it. It represents my personal experience of one of the most interesting countries and peoples I know of.

"The noblest study of mankind is man." We need not go from our own firesides to prove that; but this is made more patent to our minds by the fact that, whether we trace him through literature, science, and art here, or whether we travel through the world and view him in the various phases of his existence elsewhere, we have still an endless and interesting study before us,—a study which I think ought to make us feel humble, for after all we find how little we know and how much we have to learn.

I knew little of India before I went there. I had heard stories of the riches to be found there, of its immense plains, its dense jungles. As "India beyond the Ganges," it reminded me of my school geography, and the very severe thrashings I received from the schoolmaster, for not being able to show him on the map the very place I am about to bring before your mind's eye.

I started in a sailing vessel from the city of Cork, in charge of a draft of two hundred men for service with my regiment. Along with me was Captain Butler, a gentleman now well known as a traveller and an author. He has lately published two volumes of "Travels" in the northern part of this continent, which have already passed through several editions. At present he is the chief of the intelligence department of the force operating under Sir Garnet Wolseley on the coast of Africa. There was also another officer of my regiment with me, besides a small detachment of another regiment, with four other officers, one of whom was married. This, with the captain and mate of the ship, constituted our society, as it was to exist for one hundred and twenty days.

The night after we got to sea was very stormy, and those of the men who had indulged in too many parting glasses had to pay a severe toll in the way of seasickness. Such a set of miserable devils, huddled together like so many inanimate bundles of rags, it had never been my misfortune to behold before, as it has never been since.

However, as soon as the effects of dissipation began to disappear, and the weather toned down, with a spanking breeze we were soon sailing past the island of Madeira, which with one exception was the last sight of land we had until the voyage terminated. As we got down towards the equator, the winds began to get very uncertain, and at last we found ourselves becalmed in the "Doldrums." The Doldrums are the ten degrees north and south of the equator, and are thus named by sailors.

For nineteen days we lay like "a painted ship upon a painted ocean," without a breath of air. By day the sun poured down relentlessly on our ship, causing the pitch to bubble out of the seams of the decks, and making the interior of the ship like an oven. By night the air seemed close and uncomfortable, and all the time the sails hung about the masts as if they had no business there.

The last day of our suffering we found that there was a ship, not far from us, which was in the same predicament. We were watching her, when all at once something appeared flashing in the water; and, as it approached us, it proved to be a boat from our neighbors. On boarding us, we found that it was a Nantucket whaler which had been away on a whaling expedition for seven or eight years; and that they wanted some provisions, which our captain was enabled to supply them with. We gave them all the newspapers and books we could spare, and they took letters from us; and we had the satisfaction of finding that our friends received them.

Scarcely had our American friends left us, when a breeze sprung up, and we soon lost sight of each other. We ran down to forty degrees south latitude, into cold weather, and sailed along until we reached the eighty-ninth degree of longitude east of Greenwich, when we again turned our course north. Sailing over the immense expanse of the Southern Ocean, the only land we saw was St. Paul's, a lonely rock thousands of miles from land.

High up in the sky, we could see the frigate bird sailing away at this enormous distance from land, while behind us flew Mother Cary's chickens, the albatross, and the sea-mew. The soldiers caught several of these birds with a hook and line, and cast them loose with a collar of red cloth. No sooner did these wretched birds get in amongst their kind, in this unusual dress, than the whole crowd flew at them and tore them to pieces. The scene was one which reminded me of humanity in general. Given a red cloth in the shape of an opinion, how many human albatrosses and sea-mews, etc., would like to tear the wearer of that opinion to pieces! I have no doubt, if the good wishes of a large majority of the Orthodox people were fulfilled, none of us poor beings, members of the Free Religious Association, would last long.

The only lady we had on board, the wife of one of the officers, was always sick and confined to her cabin, and the absence of ladies gave the ship a most sombre and uncomfortable look. This would not last forever; and, when we sighted the coast of India, all knew that we should again have the chance of seeing our own countrywomen.

Madras, our point of disembarkation, on the eastern, or Coromandel, coast of India, is an open roadstead, and subject to tremendous gales, and luxuriates in a surf which frets and tosses itself unceasingly against a shingly shore. It is not very long since that a fearful cyclone blew there, and a fine trestlework pier of nearly a mile in length, completed in 1864, was torn up and beached, and numbers of ships were wrecked, and lives lost. When these storms take place, the surf lashes the shore in a state of fury; and on the day we arrived it was so bad that we dared not attempt to cross it. Sometimes for days there is no communication between the ships and the shore, except by means of the catamaran men, who are so expert that they pass through any surf. The catamaran is a small raft made of three logs lashed together; and the man who engineers this primitive craft is a gentleman in a most primitive dress, consisting of a straw hat, which is made for use and not ornament, for in it he carries the letters and dispatches with which he is intrusted. When the wind blows towards the shore, vessels have to slip their anchors and get to sea as fast as they can.

The morning after our arrival the surf moderated, and it was considered safe for us to land. The ship was surrounded by a fleet of boats, each manned by about thirty Hindus, whose primitive attire was such as to impress one at once forcibly with the idea that, whatever else they had to suffer, they had little to undergo in the way of tailors' bills. The surf boats were about thirty feet in length, unwieldy looking, and awkward,—evidently more useful than ornamental. From side to side were wooden stretchers, on which the rowers sat, and paddled along with oars much resembling long wooden spoons. At one end there was flooring and seats for the passengers, and behind these sat the steersman. The male part of the community had to watch the boat as it rose to the companion ladder, while the lady was carefully lowered in a chair enveloped in a flag, and hoisted in by a rope from the yard-arm. Seated in the stern of the boat we find ourselves in charge of a demon-like set of beings, who dip their oars to a monotonous and unmelodious chant of "la illa Allah!" or "O God, O God!" varied by demands for bucksheesh or a present, which means either a ducking or money.

As we near the shore and get to the breakers, the steersman stops the boat till one long wave rolls by, and then, with an unearthly shout, he calls to his crew, and the boat is forced through the breakers and safely beached. At this time you can feel nothing but astonishment that you have passed so safely through the wild waste of water which is now behind you. The rowers jump out and hold a chair, in which you place yourself, and are carried high and dry as carefully as if you were a new-born child.

Well, as far as India life is concerned, you are a child, though quite unlike that which you have left behind.

After realizing that we are once more on terra firma, we find we are the centre of attraction to a crowd of beings who appear to us as if they had all been let loose from a lunatic asylum for our peculiar benefit. These we find out are servants, each of whom has a handful of "characters," which they acquire very often by purchase in the bazaar or market, where they are manufactured and sold. We, not knowing the country (or the ropes, as you would say here), each engaged one of these men, and they each remained in our employment about forty-eight hours. Some got drunk, others ran away, after having helped themselves to what they fancied. We found it the custom there never to take servants without a personal recommendation, which a good man can always get from the merchants and bankers.

I employed one recommended to me by the commanding officer of the station to which I first went, and he staid and went all over the country with me as long as I was there. All your servants steal there; they exact a percentage on each purchase they make for you, no matter how small, and they grade the amount according to your rank and pay.

If you are invited out to dinner in India, your servant goes with you, and considers it his duty to have a lively fight to get you the best cut and the best bit of everything he can. When not so employed, he never pays the slightest attention to any one else, but stands with arms folded behind your chair, and, no matter what goes on, looks as sober as a judge.

Madras, thirteen degrees north of the equator and eighty degrees east longitude, is one of the oldest settlements in India, and is the capital of the presidency or section of India of the same name. It is a place of great commercial importance, and has a large population of Europeans in the white town, while a very dense population inhabit the black town. The town reaches to the sea beach, along which there is a drive with an esplanade and band-stand; and here the people of Madras, white and black, merchant and prince, soldiers and civilians, ladies and gentlemen, on horseback and in carriages, congregate in the cool of the evening to talk gossip, hear the band play, make love,—in fact, do everything humanity delights in after being let loose from the cares of the day. The ladies, when not on horseback, generally sit in their carriages, listen to the music, or talk with the gentlemen, who roam about from carriage to carriage. The music lasts till darkness begins to threaten; then the carriages begin to move off, and all go home to dress and dine, some to meet again at a ball or party, one of which is constantly occurring.

Early rising is practised by every one in India, in order that each may get the benefit of the cool of the morning. It is customary to have riding parties, and a rendezvous is appointed the previous day. I can look back with the greatest pleasure to some of my morning rides, when men and women, in a state of general good feeling with each other and the world in general, cantered along in the cool of the tropical morning.

After our ride we generally stopped at some friend's house, where we partook of the chota haziri, or little breakfast, and the charm in this was in the uncertainty where we should do so. I always found that the best way, being a creature of circumstance, was to accommodate myself to them, and resignedly sit down under the first pair or pairs of pretty eyes, be they black, blue, or gray, under which fate brought me.

About October the English steamers used to bring out young ladies who came to seek their fate in the matrimonial market in India. They all came out with a full determination to get married; and in almost every case in my limited experience they carried out their intentions.

You can well imagine the junction of May and December was frequent.

The ladies under whose care the débutantes came out are said to have given the following advice: "Always try and catch a civilian, for they are always worth £300 a year, dead or alive; next to them an army officer, of not less rank than a major; and have nothing to do with the officers of the Queen's regiments, for they have got no Fund—no pension, in fact, of any account."

Every one separates after the little breakfast is over, and rides home to dress, and get ready for the real breakfast which precedes the business of the day. Between the hours of eleven and two, the ladies receive callers at their houses, and no one is expected to call after, unless specially invited to lunch, which is but another name for a very substantial midday meal, and is called "tiffeir."

Croquet parties were frequent, and were largely patronized, particularly by ladies who had a pretty foot and ankle. I noticed they were always enthusiasts in the game.

While the Europeans gave balls, and danced themselves (to the astonishment of the natives, who could not understand why a person should dance, if he could get some one else to do it for him), the natives, on the other hand, used to give entertainments where nautch or dancing girls were the feature, and where the European sahib, or gentleman, would, if he happened to be invited, be provided with as good champagne, brandy, soda, etc., as he could get amongst his own people.

With this introduction of Indian life, we must say farewell to it, and proceed on our journey to the "land of the white elephant." A white elephant is a freak of Nature. There are, I believe, three known to exist at the present time, one belonging to the King of Burmah, another to the King of Siam, and the third to the Llama of Thibet.

Leaving India, we have to cross the Bay of Bengal. On this voyage I experienced the grandest and most furious of the many storms at sea through which, in my varied wanderings, I have passed. The wind shrieked through the rigging, and the sea was lashed to perfect fury. The captain told me that he considered the storm to be travelling at the rate of at least one hundred miles an hour. These storms are so well known now amongst mariners that it is comparatively easy to avoid the worst of them by steering away from the nucleus.

In case of a steamer, of course, this is easy; a sailing vessel, however, has more trouble to get away. These storms have a circular motion of their own, as well as an onward motion; and the ring of wind is extensive, varying from one hundred miles to greater distances in breadth. The centre is said to be calm as far as the wind is concerned, but with the same furious sea running.

During the storm a man fell overboard, and nothing could be done for him. Nothing ever so forcibly reminded me of Victor Hugo's work, Les Misérables, as this scene. The chapter headed "A Man Overboard" gives a most graphic description; so much so that, when I read it, this harrowing scene is vividly reproduced in my mind.

The mouth of the Irrawaddy River is, when you see it first, not much dissimilar to that of the Mississippi. The Irrawaddy rises in the mountains in the north of China, and is the great highway through a considerable portion of this country; for so luxuriant is the vegetation, and so thinly populated the country, that roads, except near towns, are not kept open.

At about thirty miles from the mouth is the city of Rangoon, a place of considerable commercial importance, possessing an immense timber trade from the northern provinces.

Before the British took possession of Burmah in 1852, it was nothing but a collection of bamboo huts, thatched with the leaf of the water-palm; and these were frequently burned down, new houses similarly constructed replacing them in time to share the same fate.

Under the native Burman kings the Burman dared not display any wealth, if he had the slightest regard for his life; for his king had none. As soon, however, as they found that the display of wealth did not render them liable to such consequences under the English rule, they soon began to use their wealth in erecting better houses and in personal adornment. The Burmese ladies wear valuable jewelry, and a great quantity of it. Rangoon at present is a city of palaces, possessing as fine buildings as most of the other European Indian cities.

In prison here was the King of India, who was sent to this place soon after the mutiny of the Sepoys. I went to see him, and found him in a room where, during his power, he would not have quartered the meanest of his subjects. Picture to yourself a wretched, decrepit, and imbecile old man, and you have before you the representative of the Great Moguls, the occupants of the throne of Delhi. He was sitting on a bedstead, and was being fed by an attendant, and altogether showed monarchy in a sad state of burlesque. Poor old man! I don't believe that he was much, if at all, to blame for the murders of our women and children; but, decrepit as he was, he was a power in India, and was sent to Burmah, where he was amongst a different race of natives who had no sympathy with him. While in India, he was so hedged round with dignity that the English Captain of the Guard had to approach him with shoes off; and the Viceroy of India visited him as an independent sovereign,—a claim to which dignity he had never relinquished. But now what was left of all this but a miserable existence in a miserable shed,—a prisoner without power? He died a few years ago.

At Rangoon is one of the most celebrated shrines of the Buddhist religion, and a numerous body of priests inhabit the place. Here, too, is one of their most celebrated pagodas, named shony, or golden. Conceive a vast cone, the base containing 640,000 square feet of concentric polygonal courses of brick-work, tapering away to a point to the height of 383 feet, and covered with gold leaf from base to summit, and you have this immense structure before you. Standing on an elevation of two hundred feet above the river, it is seen for miles, towering above the surrounding jungle, and glistening in the sun.

This is said to be the place where Gaudama landed some three thousand years ago, when Nebuchadnezzar was indulging himself in the prairies of Syria, and Daniel was in Babylon.

This pagoda stands upon two terraces, one above the other, 800 feet long and 680 broad, each side facing one of the four cardinal points. The area it stands on is almost an acre and a half, and there are at least twenty-four acres of gold leaf pasted outside the structure. The terraces are approached, on each of the four sides, by long staircases guarded by two enormous sphinx-like figures, which, on examining, we find are built of brick, and then covered and moulded with cement. The bottoms of beer-bottles were made use of for the eyes.

The summit of the pagoda is surmounted by the sacred tee, or umbrella, which consists of a series of concentric rings of iron, decreasing in diameter as they approach the top. Little bells with heart-shaped pieces of iron attached to their tongues are hung round these circles; and the slightest breath which ruffles the air gives music to the bells, and shows the industry of the Burmese in the science of bell-making. The Burmese are celebrated for the excellence of their bells, and the full tone which almost all possess from the smallest to the largest. Some of these are large enough to accommodate a moderate sized dinner-party, and range from that to the size of a hand-bell.

In this shrine there are deposited a number of relics of Buddha, one of which is a hair from his beard, and another is a water-dipper, etc.; therefore it is most sacred. Worshippers must think it so, for they come from the confines of Thibet and China to pay their devotions, and the amount of the offerings during a year must be enormous.

In all the pagodas there is a large amount of treasure in gold, silver, and precious stones. This I know to be the case from personal observation, for I saw the remains of an old pagoda removed, in consequence of commanding one of our forts, and in it were found numerous gold, silver, and bronze images, together with precious stones of every description. I myself had a handful of small rubies which I collected from the rubbish, which individually were too small to be of any intrinsic value; but besides these were valuable gems which government took possession of.

What this pagoda is to the Buddhist the Holy City of Benares is to the Hindu, Ceraba at Mecca to the faithful Mussulman, or the tomb of Christ to the Christian pilgrim. The form of the pagoda, in its chasteness of design and majesty of structure, seems a fit exponent of the majesty of the Deity. Its attractive form, tapering towards the sky, leads one to look there, and the effect is different from that produced by the temples of India proper, on whose walls sculptures of the most intense obscenity are delicately traced by the artist in stone. The terrace of the pagoda was a favorite spot for every one, and I cannot wonder at it. Round it were numbers of grotesque statues, which soon tired one; but the beautiful landscape which was presented to our view from this height was one that to look at once was to wish to behold forever.

From the east round to the west was a range of mountains, which disappeared in the distance, and looked like the walls of an immense amphitheatre. The floor of this was an immense plain which looked like a piece of the most lovely green embroidery, with the rivers as silver thread crossing it. As I stood on the terrace of the pagoda, the golden light of the sun, sinking as it were sadly into the west, threw a mellow light on the beautiful landscape before me, gradually becoming dimmer and dimmer, until it seemed like the melting away of a beautiful dream. The great pagoda lost its lustre, and its majestic form seemed to change into an immense dark tower pointing towards heaven. Its black massiveness remained until its golden casing was awakened once more to a glorious brilliancy, reflected from the moon, which again lighted up the landscape. The whole seemed like a beautiful transformation scene. Indeed, it was one in which Nature pulled the ropes and gave motion to the machinery.

The Buddhist religion is one of the most liberal and tolerant in the world. Its general tenets are that it is the duty of man to do good to man, and to look with respect on all other religions which inculcate this.

The sights of Rangoon being well nigh exhausted, the next thing to be done was to get ready to go up country. Our travelling was to be almost altogether on the rivers, and our means of locomotion a canoe about forty feet long, hewn out of a solid log of teak. One end of the boat was thatched, and in this house we could sleep all night free from dew, while during the day we were well protected from the sun. As long as we were within reach of the tide, there was no exertion in propelling the boat up the river, but after that bamboo poles came into requisition. When the tide had carried us up as far as it could, having begun to ebb, we came to anchor. During the night the tide flowed. I had dropped into a deep sleep, when the boats, of which I had about one hundred and fifty with me, came all crushing and tearing against mine. It was pitch-dark; and, what with the yelling of the boatmen, and the crashing and tearing of the boats, it was some time before I could realize exactly what was going on around me. However, collecting my scattered thoughts, and realizing where I was, I found that my boat came safely through the ordeal; and eventually we disembarked at Pegu to march across a plain of about thirty miles in breadth, to get to the River Sitang, on which we were to continue our journey. Here we found the remains of an old city, with a pagoda rivalling that of Rangoon in height, and evidently, from the masses of gold leaf sticking to it, at one time in riches. The Burmans are adepts in brick-making; and as engineers they are by no means to be despised. Their mode of repairing their pagodas is exceedingly ingenious, for they form a net-work of bamboo round the structure, and are thus enabled to reach any portion of it in perfect safety. Bamboo is extensively used in their house-building, and is very often the cause of fires. It gets dry and cracks, and the coating of silica acts as a flint and steel, emitting a spark which fires the inflammable thatch. Nothing puts out the fire until it dies out. I saw a bazaar or market of closely packed houses such as these burned, and it did not take long, notwithstanding there were several acres of them. The houses of the priests and princes and better class of Burmans are well put together, being generally constructed of teak, a wood plentiful in Burmah, and well calculated to withstand the attack of insects and time. They are tastefully decorated with filigree-work, and attest the ingenuity and skill of the Burmans in the science of carpentry. The Burmans have brick roads and pathways all over the country. They are very old, but the bricks have been well made and properly burned, and were in most cases in a good state of preservation. These roads are a necessity; for a great portion of the year Burmah is under water. Indeed, the rain-fall in Burmah approaches two hundred inches in the year. I have seen it rain almost continually for seven consecutive months, while the other five would have no rain at all.

During the war, the stockades which the Burmans had were a system of fortification which nothing could get through except round shot. They were formed of upright logs of teak, and during the New Zealand wars the people in that country have protected themselves in a similar way.

The plain between the two rivers is about thirty miles across by three hundred miles long, and is infested with wild animals of every description. On the sand, as we marched along, we could see the imprints of tigers' feet, representing not one animal, but a number. Indeed, we could hear them growling in the elephant grass. We had flambeaus or torches, and there were altogether about two hundred men, with the necessary wagons for our baggage, and transport for sick and women; so that our large number prevented any likelihood of attack.

The elephant grass is perfectly unfit for food for any animal; in fact, it is a coarse reed, but, growing as it does to the height of eight feet, it forms an almost impenetrable brake where snakes and wild animals abound. It is not so impenetrable as a bamboo thicket; but next to that I hardly know anything more difficult to get through. In the months of March and April, when the dry weather sets in, the grass is often set on fire, and an ocean of flame sweeps across the face of the country.

We passed up a portion of the Sitang River where the grass was on fire on both sides; the heat was so intense that it was only by keeping the thatch of our boats wet that we escaped being burned out. So fierce were the glare and heat at one time, that I seriously thought of ordering the boats back until the fire had died out. However, the boatmen did not seem to object, and I was getting so tired of the worry and anxiety of having so many men and women under my charge that I gladly allowed them to proceed.

I had about twenty soldiers' wives with me, and a more troublesome and disorderly crew I never had the care of before, and never wish to again. They used to swear, drink, and fight, and I was constantly having to threaten them with what punishment I could inflict. Their great bone of contention with me was that they wanted a ration of spirits like the men. This I did not concede; but they managed to get enough drink to fill them, and keep them in a chronic state of drunkenness. On one occasion a great, strapping Irish woman attacked me, as I was walking on a sand-bank, our halting place that evening, and told me she intended to thrash me. She was fighting drunk, and I temporized with her until I got near the guard and handed her over to their care.

All the punishment I could inflict was to fine these ladies six months of their government allowance of thirty dollars each. I fined every one of them, and this had the effect of keeping them quieter, much to my satisfaction, for the remainder of the journey; for, I assure you, sometimes I did not know what to do with them. In fact, the management of twenty women was a task of such magnitude that I dare not attempt it. Of course I had to pretend to be very stern with them; but at the end of the voyage a very penitent demonstration being made, and numerous tears shed, I made no mention of my award to the commanding officer of my regiment, and the fines were not enforced.

I must now return to the denizens of the elephant grass.

An officer in the same regiment with myself was on staff-employment in the police. He was travelling on foot along a pathway through one of these brakes, and he came upon an unpleasant looking customer in the shape of an immense tiger. He was only armed with a stick, which he used to defend himself; but this did not avail him much, for the tiger clawed him, and got him down, and, seizing him in his mouth by the back of the neck, proceeded to haul him into the jungle and feed on him comfortably and quietly, when his men and servants came up and managed to frighten the tiger off. The brute wounded him badly, but he was, he informed me, at no time unconscious, and felt very much as a rat must feel in a cat's mouth. No vital part was injured; but he had a crooked neck, and, up to the time I saw him last, his stiff neck attested the narrow escape he had had. As far as I know he is still alive, and is Governor of Winchester Jail, in the south of England. There are numbers of people killed yearly by these animals.

On arriving at the bank of the Sitang River, we found that it was necessary to wait until the bore or tidal wave should have passed. This wave, at periodical seasons (full moon), sweeps up this river with great violence, and carries destruction to any boat which may be on it at the time. It is called by the Burmese the calima yey, or "rascal water." It is caused by the peculiar shape of the river-mouth, which is that of a bell; and, the spring tides being very high, the sudden contraction of the water piles it into a high and formidable wave, whose advance is heralded by a noise like approaching thunder. It reaches the height of ten or twelve feet.

Dr. Whitaker, the assistant-surgeon of my regiment, got into one of these waves with his boat, and his steersman fell overboard and was drowned, while the doctor and his boat flew up the river at a furious rate; but, fortunately for him, it did not come to grief,—although it used to be said he became bald from the effects of the terror he underwent. This was a libel; but the doctor certainly had little hair on his head, and we wanted to account in this manner, much to his disgust, for the want of it. The doctor is a cousin of the Whitakers, the pork-men in this city.

The same style of canoe was used by us in this river for about two hundred and fifty miles, and we moved by poling. Along the banks lay the alligator; and in the trees the monkeys were numerous, and sat eyeing us like so many Darwinian cousins.

One mode of catching a monkey is this: a Burman takes a cocoanut shell, and makes a hole at one end sufficient for a monkey to put his hand in; he attaches the other, by a rope passed through a small hole, to a tree or post. In this shell he places a quantity of rice, and the monkey, in attempting to get at it, clenches his fist and thus cannot get away.

All along the banks of the river we find villages, into one of which some of my men went and stole some fowls. Presently an old woman came down weeping. She was like one of the old witches in Macbeth. Not knowing what had happened, I was at a loss as to her gestures; but my servant, who knew the language, told me what she complained of. I knew it was useless to make any investigation, and presented her with a small amount of money, which seemed to please her so much that she brought me down a beautiful cat. I was told by my Hindu servant not to accept the cat, as I should be bewitched. However, I kept the cat, and he stayed with me until he was unfortunately killed.

The species of cats in Burmah are most peculiar, particularly in their caudal development. Their tails present the most fantastic forms of knots that it is possible to conceive.

We used to halt at sundown opposite a sand-bank, which soon became as lively as if a fair was being held on it. The men and women got their rations from the commissariat, and the various preparations for next day's journey had to be made.

This done, and darkness beginning to come on, the scene on the sand-bank was somewhat picturesque. Our servants got our tables out of the boats, and spread them with our cloths and crockery, and lighted them with lamp candlesticks, preparatory to giving us dinner. The scene on the bank is a lively one. Here are our tables, brilliant with light, and laden, if not with luxuries, at any rate with good substantial fare, flanked by bottles of Bass's pale ale. Further along the bank the Burmese have lighted fires round which they are collected, gesticulating, laughing, and smoking; no doubt canvassing the events of the day, and the peculiarities of the live cargo of their boats. Scattered here and there are the soldiers, their white uniforms showing plainly as they pass any of the lights or fires. We have taken our places at the table, and our dusky attendants, turbanned and clothed in white, are wandering about silent and mysterious, like so many spectres, but much more usefully employed in attending to our creature comfort. Our dinner is soon discussed, and we then set to to smoke and while away the time, thinking possibly of some one whom we have left far away across the sea. The fires gradually die out, and we begin to nod,—then with a start wake up and find the bank deserted. We too retire to our boats where our tables, etc., are taken, and the sand-bank soon returns to its pristine stillness. So we do night after night, until we arrive at our destination. Just as day breaks, our boats again move off.

The sand-banks on the Sitang and the Irrawaddy are as changeable as those of the Mississippi. In the former rivers, during the dry season, the banks are uncovered, but on the advance of the wet season the flow of the water scoops them out, and where they once were is then the deepest part of the channel. So the rivers move year after year.

[For THE INDEX.]

SPEECH OF MR. R. H. RANNEY

BEFORE THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON "JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION," AT THE STATE HOUSE, MARCH 26, 1874.

The petitioners have come before you asking the repeal of the laws exempting religious, charitable, and educational institutions from taxation, believing that the people, the Legislature, and you, their committee, desire that there shall be, as far as practicable, just and equal taxation.

The remonstrants to this petition have appeared before you, among other things urging that our prayer should not be granted on such grounds; that justice and equality are impossible; that "equality is the dream of the socialist," and can never be realized. They would have you believe that all legislation on such grounds should be abandoned.

I will not attempt to argue the point whether absolute justice and equality are attainable or not; but even if they are not, that such ideas are to be abandoned I utterly deny.

If I understand the spirit of our government, it is to lay down broad principles founded on justice and equity; and it is the duty of its legislators to conform to such principles as fully as lies in their power.

All that your petitioners ask, all that they desire, is that, if it be more in accordance with justice and equality to do so, these laws be repealed; otherwise not; and that you will not consider the fact of the existence of inequalities in other matters to be a justification for the refusal of equality in this.

One of the remonstrants (the last but one, I think,) spoke long and eloquently of the abuses that exist, whereby a man can, by acquiring a residence out of town, and in other ways, evade the payment of his just share of taxation for the protection of his property; and he objected to our petition, not because our claim is unjust, not because we have no cause for complaint, but because we ought to wait until these other inequalities are adjusted.

We trust that you will not delay justice on any such ground as this. That one injustice should be continued because another has not been removed, is an argument which we do not believe you will accept.

The question of these exemptions is before you. Are our claims well founded? If they are, you will make your report in favor of repeal; and if at any time there be any practical measure brought before you, whereby the evils of which the gentlemen spoke can be obviated, we trust you will do your duty in that matter also.

One of the principal points made by the remonstrants, especially by the gentleman from South Boston, was that unproductive property is untaxable; that only such property as gives pecuniary returns in the shape of profits should be made to pay taxes; and that, as these institutions, especially churches, are not a source of revenue to their owners, they should be exempt from taxation. "If you tax the farm," exclaimed this gentleman, "which furnishes no profit, the taxes will eventually eat up the farm!"

Now if it were a recognized principle of taxation that taxes should be assessed on revenue only, there might be force to this plea as applied to churches; but as property is universally taxed as such, whether of profit to its owners or a loss to them, it strikes me as an evidence of the weakness of the case of the remonstrants that they are thus obliged to strike at the very basis of our entire system of taxation.

Let us suppose two such unproductive farms as were referred to, side by side. Then let us suppose that, for the reason of its unproductiveness, the Legislature exempts one of them from taxation. Is it not evident that, if unjust before, it is doubly so now, since the burden of one is placed on the other, which is as fully entitled to exemption as the first? But, supposing that a neighboring church is exempt, and that the two farms remain taxed, is not the injustice as palpable?

Yet this is what the remonstrants have asked, unless they desire that our whole system of taxation of property as such should be abolished, and that assessments should be made only on revenue. So long as the present system is to remain, we protest against the exemption of any property merely because of its unproductiveness.

We have repeatedly heard it urged at these hearings, as a reason for existing exemptions, that these charitable and other institutions "do the State's work;" that, "were it not for them, the State would have the same work to do, and bear the entire expense alone." Throughout this Commonwealth there are thousands of people who from age or infirmity are dependents, and who, were it not for the charity and benevolence of individuals, would be thrown upon the public for support. If they were to be all thrown upon the State, an enormous expense would be entailed; but has any one proposed that these benevolent individuals should have their property exempt for doing the State's work? I think not. Then why have the legitimate taxes of the man who supports his crippled brother increased, by exempting the institution which supports his neighbor's mother? Those who support their dependent relatives or friends provide for them in their own way; and if the result on the part of individuals is that they bear the entire expense alone, so it ought to be with corporations which provide for the dependent members of their own sect in their own way.

The charitable institutions which have been brought to your notice, in order to show the expenditure which the State avoids by their existence, are mostly founded by the friends of the inmates, to secure to them Roman Catholic instruction or some other advantage which the State does not give. No doubt, there are special cases where charitable and educational institutions should receive State aid; but this should be done by direct appropriation, after a full hearing of the reasons for granting it. In no case, however, should sectarian institutions be aided; and individual claims should be considered as valid as those of corporations. It was one of the remonstrants, as you doubtless remember, who admitted that educational and charitable institutions partially devoted to other purposes had no just claim to exemption.

I would now call your attention to the special consideration of church property.

The relation which churches bear to the State is unlike that borne by these other institutions. We have schools, charities, etc., supported at the public expense; and, when this is done in a proper and equitable manner, it is conceded that some may receive State aid which are not entirely under the control of the State. If, however, it were a cardinal principle of our government that no State support should be given to charities and schools,—if it were universally believed to be both just and proper that there should be none,—and if you as a committee desired to be true to that principle,—I think that you would not long hesitate to decide that exemption from taxation ought not to be granted to such institutions.

It is in this manner that religious institutions differ from all others. Our government stands committed against the union of Church and State. The United States Constitution expressly forbids it. Church support, which years ago was drawn from the people by direct taxation, was long since abolished, and the principle that religious institutions should be supported by voluntary contribution alone was almost universally accepted, in theory if not in practice, as one of the fundamental principles of the republic. The voluntary supporters of churches were as ready to admit the principle as those who paid nothing towards their support. And why? Because the founders of our government recognized the fact that it is the duty of society to respect the rights of the individual conscience! Religious institutions relate to matters of conscience almost entirely, and for this reason were made the exception. The man who pays freely and cheerfully for the support of his own faith cannot, without violation of his own conscience, pay even a small sum for the support of those doctrines which he considers erroneous and dangerous in their effects. So sacred were the rights of the individual conscience held to be by the founders of our government, that it was taught that, even if all but a very small minority believed religious institutions to be of benefit to the whole community, this fact would not justify the compulsory support of them by the public.

"Religious toleration and equal rights to all" has been the standing invitation to foreigners to come to our shores. In response to this invitation, Catholic Ireland, which has been compelled to support the Church of England because the governing powers considered it "for the best good of all," has sent thousands of her sons; and we all agree, notwithstanding the fact that many of us do believe the Church of England to be of benefit to that country, that it is an outrage of the rights of the individual for Great Britain to compel her Catholic and other dissenting subjects to support the Church.

Although theoretically, however, we have abandoned public support of the Church, practically it is continued in this State to the amount of over half a million dollars annually by church exemption. All property is taxed for the protection the State gives it. The full amount of the tax is the State's property, whether it be collected or uncollected. The exemption of any property is an appropriation of money due the State. The exemption of church property from taxation is an appropriation for church support, as much as though the tax were collected, and paid over to them. In this way is the principle of no public support of the Church violated.

Yet for desiring to sustain this principle of religious liberty, we have had our motives impeached, and our efforts characterized as an "assault on religion." If loyalty to the principle that "no one shall be compelled to support a religious society of which he is not a member" is assaulting religion, we are guilty of the charge; otherwise not. It is this principle for which we most earnestly contend. It is not the amount of the tax we complain of; for whether it be $542,000 annually, or only $5.42, so long as the State appropriates any of its funds for church support, your petitioners will continue to protest.

That exemption is virtual appropriation seems to be as apparent to the remonstrants as to ourselves; hence their strong desire and endeavor to make it appear that unprofitable property is not taxable. The committee will recollect, I think, that one of the remonstrants distinctly stated that he should be opposed to granting subsidies to the churches, since that would be giving them State support; but he insisted that exemption was not appropriation, and justified exemption of the churches only on the ground that they, being unproductive property, were not property at all in a taxable sense.

I refer to this to call your attention to the fact that the remonstrants also admit the principle that the State should not support churches. That exemption is, in reality, rendering public support, I think has been already shown.

But, for the sake of the argument, we are willing to waive the question of the right of the State to support churches for the present, and admit that the churches stand on the same basis as educational, charitable, and agricultural institutions. What are the reasons given for appropriating to them the amount of their taxes? Mainly these: that "the churches are the conservators of public morals;" that "they do the community good," and that, were it not for them, there would be more criminals to be cared for by the State, etc. Such general statements as these, in various different forms but substantially the same in import, are all that I have heard offered to justify the annual expenditure of one-half million dollars and upwards in this State towards the support of churches.

If the public moral welfare be the object for this large expenditure, then of course the amount should be apportioned among the churches according to the amount of good each does. As it stands now, this is determined by the value of the building in which the moral instruction is given! To illustrate:—

1. At the average rate of taxation last year in this State, $14.49 per $1,000 (in Boston it was much larger), the great $3,000,000 cathedral on Washington Street is to receive $43,470 for the good it does.

2. The State is to pay the Baptist society of Tremont Temple $8,694 for the good it does.

3. The Universalist church on Columbus Avenue, worth at least $200,000, improves public morals to the amount of $2,898.

4. An ordinary $5,000 church the State considers a public benefactor to the amount of $72.45 annually.

5. The little, unsteepled, unpainted, country church, worth perhaps $1,000, and holding as a rule more worshippers than the magnificent city structure, does moral service to the amount of $14.49 annually.

6. The society which is too poor to own a building, and is obliged to hire a hall for the purpose, is considered as worse than useless, and not only receives nothing for the good it does, but the hall which it uses is taxed in the shape of extra rent. Not only must it pay for its legitimate share of public expense, but also for the support of the wealthier societies which have buildings of their own, and which for that reason alone are considered by the law to have a greater moral influence.

7. The grand spire of the Washington Street cathedral, which will entail one-third of the cost of the building, is by this law considered to be a "public conservator of morals" as serviceable to the State as two thousand churches worth $5,000 each, and receives public support accordingly.

8. A society owns a lot and building, worth say $10,000, and is this year paid for its moral influence $144.90. After awhile a railroad company or some other party desires the lot, and at an enormous price the society sells it. Next year, with the proceeds of this so-called "unproductive property," an edifice is reared on Back Bay at a cost of $100,000; and the State considers its "sphere of moral influence" so increased that it henceforth allows it an annuity of $1,449.

Now how is all this money practically paid? The answer is patent to all. By the extra assessment of all other property in the State. The property of the man who belongs to the $5,000 society, or the hall society, or neither, pays as much towards it as the property of the man whose interests lie in the most gorgeous church in the land. And the sect which has the most church property gets the largest share of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this may be a very satisfactory condition of things for those who wish you to discard justice and equality as impracticable, especially if they belong to some of the more wealthy corporations to which I have referred. But I believe that good sense will tell you that the money value of a building is no criterion of the amount of moral influence proceeding from it; and that a system establishing such a criterion should be abolished.

That there is great personal interest in having these exemptions continued, on the part of these more wealthy corporations, you can see as well as I; and, if the remonstrants had any valid reasons to give why these exemptions should be continued, I think they would have given them. For my part, Mr. Chairman, I see ten times as good a reason for exempting the property of, or even paying the salary of, the clergyman who teaches good morals, as I do for exempting church buildings; and if the State really intends to reward from its treasury good moral influences, the good clergymen should have their share, and the good laymen theirs.

It is unwise, to say the least, to appropriate public funds for the express purpose of supporting good moral influences; but I think you will agree with me that the present system of exemption is certainly not a just and equitable method of doing it. So far as it discriminates at all, it is in favor of the rich as against the poor corporations,—in favor of corporations as against individuals,—and with no proper discrimination as to the amount of good done. Even were this not the case, it is a violation of the rights of conscience, in that it is supporting churches with public funds. In short, since all property, whether profitable to its owners or not, is justly held taxable for the protection the government gives, it would seem to be incumbent upon this committee to report in favor of the repeal of these exemption laws, as an infringement of the principles of "just and equal taxation."

KOERNER'S "NATUR-ETHIK."*

BY PRESIDENT PORTER, OF YALE COLLEGE.

As we open this elaborate work, our attention is attracted to the fact that the preface is dated at New York, May, 1873. We next observe that the book was printed in Leipsic. The title-page had already informed us that it was published at Hamburg. This is but one of the many indications that the ends of the world are not far from one another, and that a free and rapid interchange of thought and opinion must attend the mingling of nationalities in this country. Even our books begin to be written in America and printed in Europe.

This is the bulkiest and the most elaborate treatise upon ethics which was ever written in America. The title Natur-Ethik but partially indicates the standpoint of the writer, and the character of his treatise. "Natur-Ethik" may mean ethical science as discovered by the light of Nature. It need not necessarily imply hostility to, but simply exclusiveness from, what is often known as theological or Christian ethics—i.e., ethics as enlarged and modified by revealed or Christian truth. In the present instance, however, it signifies ethics as independent of, and antagonistic to, all religious belief whatever. It emphasizes the leading characteristic of a system which is hostile to every form of religious sentiment and religious motives. The ethics of Nature taught in this volume, moreover, are not only positively atheistic, but passionately anti-religious. In every other particular it is written in a truly scientific spirit. The reading of the author has been very comprehensive. His knowledge of ethical systems seems to be exact and dispassionate. His ideal of human excellence is elevated. His conception of human virtue provides for benevolence, self-sacrifice, self-control, purity, modesty, and honor. His teachings are not limited to the external actions, but extend to the springs of action, purifying and elevating them almost after the requirements of the Christian ideal. And yet he confines himself strictly to the limits of pure Nature, finding no God beyond the bounds of the finite universe of matter and spirit, no assured immortality beyond the ascertained termination of human existence, and no responsible will beneath the play of the conflicting impulses and desires that emerge in the human consciousness.

It would not be unprofitable to show, under various points of contrast, that the atheistic naturalism taught by this writer is greatly superior to the similar system which is held by Stuart Mill and the writers for the Fortnightly Review. Both systems agree in being purely Nature systems. Both find no place for God, or a responsible will, or holiness, or sin, or moral responsibility, or an immortal destiny. But the English systems are in spirit materialistic, mechanical, and empirical—limiting themselves in the main to the lessons of experience, and the probabilities which these lessons sanction.

The system of this writer is organic and spiritual, finding gradation and purposes and relative independence in the great organism of matter and spirit which makes up the universe. But with these important differences culture is the watchword of both, having in the one a far wider and higher significance than in the other, yet finding no place in either for God, for moral responsibility, or the immortal life. Both would benefit and adorn society and provide for the indefinite improvement and perfectibility of man, by elevating and purifying the springs of action within and the external conditions of comfort and culture. But beyond culture as thus limited by psychological and social science neither would go; for there are no resources for either in the responsible soul, the immortal life, and the living God.

To many, if not the most, of those who have been trained to Christian conceptions and associations, it would seem impossible that a system of atheistic secularism could be anything else than repulsive from its very hideousness, and dry from the barrenness and poverty of its motives and promises. Such persons are little aware how fascinating it can become to the imagination, how elevating to the feelings, and how proudly unselfish is its disdain of the inspiration and reward which comes from God and immortality; and, consequently, are unable to appreciate how great is its power over men of refined susceptibilities, of generous culture, and enlarged philanthropy.

The perusal of these volumes, and the discovery of the elevation of many of its moral axioms, and the sound common sense of its minor ethics, as well as its uncompromising conservatism in respect to marriage, social order, the rights of property, the duty of labor, the obligations of temperance, purity, frugality, and thrift, might well lead to some useful impressions in respect to the attractiveness and plausibility with which the anti-Christ of to-day sets forth his claims, in antagonism to the Christ of the New Testament. One feature alone betrays the malignant devil that lurks beneath these robes of grace, and that is the contemptuous and bitter scorn with which theology and religion, in all their forms, are persistently spoken of, and the one-sided unfairness with which the origin and power of religious beliefs and influences is explained.

The ethical system of the author may be more satisfactorily understood by stating a few of his leading positions. The human species is the highest among all organized beings of Nature. This elevated position gives to man his human dignity, which depends preëminently upon his being conscious of himself and his operations of perceiving, feeling, thinking, and judging. The estimate of this rank and dignity belongs to the race and to each individual. Among all the manifestations that are appropriate to man, the moral are the most characteristic of man as a person, supposing, as they do, the joint and harmonious action of all his powers. Hence the highest degree of development which is possible to him is the moral. Hence we derive the fundamental principle. Man should strive to realize the highest well-being of himself and others for the present, and the highest possible perfection of both for the future.

Man is also impelled toward the well-being and perfection of himself and of others by an original impulse of his nature, because he lives in an organic relation to others than himself—both things and persons. As he rises in his intellect from the concrete to the abstract, these impulses fix on the ideal well-being of himself and others. As we make the feelings of others objects of apprehension, our well-willing for their welfare becomes sympathy with their feelings. Moral love is an intelligent impulse toward the highest moral being and perfection of others. It necessarily impels to well-doing. The conditions of well-doing are knowledge for direction—righteousness or justice—i.e., the recognition of the equality of others as the objects of our wishing and doing well to them, incidental to which is a regard to their personal freedom.

Freedom, as the condition of moral activity and responsibility, is opposed to necessity. Necessity is the dependence universal to every existing thing, or the forces and laws of the universe without. Freedom is the capacity of each individual to mould and subject these forces and laws to the production and development of its separate life. The two terms are relative. There is no absolute necessity or freedom, in fact. What we call necessity is limited by the forces that lie undeveloped in the nature of the individual. What we call freedom is limited by the external conditions of its development. Freedom of will, or inner freedom, is a pure fiction. No higher freedom is conceivable than to act and grow according to inner forces and laws.

Responsibility springs out of man's capacity for intelligence in his acts and wishes and inner dispositions, as well as for external acts. Man can be impelled to ideal objects, and can estimate the good or evil tendency of depositions; and, therefore, he can accept or reject his own inner states, can cultivate what he approves and repress what he rejects. In other words, man is intelligent and social and self-conscious, capable of development and culture; and these endowments, and the impulses connected with them, determine his capacity for moral experiences and obligations.

The defects of this system are obvious enough to any one who has accepted a system which provides for personal responsibility in the endowment of individual freedom of will, and so makes possible the alternative of sin and holiness in character and in act.

The practical treatment of the various human relations, and the duties which grow out of them, is open to little exception, except from the entire absence of those influences which come from a sense of individual responsibility and the moral government of God.

The concluding chapter (pp. 477–609) treats of the development of morality in the past history of men and of its present status. To the believer in religious and Christian ethics it is a fearful chapter. For through all its sharp criticism of the actual past and present and its elevated and hopeful idealism, there is such an uncritical and demoniacal hatred of every form of religion as to show most clearly that the author has been seriously disturbed from the equipoise which the truly scientific thinker acknowledges that he ought uniformly to maintain. The author is far enough from being a disciple of the new materialism. He is neither a pessimist nor a nihilist. He is an idealist, to whom culture, under the conditions of the natural constitution and natural laws, is the substitute for conscience, immortality, and God.—Independent.

DR. DIO LEWIS, having succeeded in gathering about him quite a crowd of sanguine people, proposes to storm Worcester with his new temperance plan, and we may hear before long of the raids of praying and singing bands of women before and within the bar-rooms of the "heart of the Commonwealth." We respect the motive of the doctor and his co-laborers, but we cannot but think that the movement will only bring ridicule and failure to those who engage in it. The spectacle of a mob of women attacking the bar-rooms of a city, and singing and praying, in the hope of breaking up the liquor traffic, will but excite general merriment and rough sarcasm. Intemperance is too big an evil to be corrected by such a novel and peculiar exhibition as is proposed.—Boston Globe.

A RECOMPENSE.

BY MRS. D. H. CLARK.

Deeper my grief than I can say!
A thought is with me all the day,—
A thought that will not go away:

That, if my watchful care had been
More tender, and had hedged him in
The golden bars of Love between,

The Stranger, on his silent way,
The Stranger in the garments gray,
Had passed my darling by that day,—

Had spared the little life. And yet,
If all to future moan and fret
The current of his days had set,

Could I be thankful? Nay, not so;
Better the tentlet green and low,
Sweeter this truth that now I know.

I would not give so sweet a thing,
The shadow of my baby's wing,
For all the purples of a king.

I would not give the shining grace
That lingered on his fair, wee face,
For all the gifts of pride or place,—

The memory of his joyous weeks
For all the bliss a lover seeks,
For all the lore a scholar speaks.

So go your way: I am content
Remembering him—without lament
For the brief space that he was lent.

GLIMPSES.

The total number of signatures thus far received to the "Congressional Petition" is 4,590, — to the "Massachusetts Petition," 8,809.

The fact that Congress is in favor of inflation is one of the strongest arguments to be adduced to prove the necessity of "compulsory education." The ignorance of the people on this subject will involve everybody in common sufferings—a few speculators alone excepted. The poor will find this out when prices go up again.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been sent in as follows since last week: From L. A. Kingsbury, Needham, 41; from James Humphreys, Dedham, 5; from The Index office, 22; from C. B. Adams, 2; from S. C. Oliver, Salem, 7; from Edwin Brown, Boston, 25; from Thomas Dowling, Malden, 38. Total for the week—140.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" have been received since last week as follows: From Joel S. Richards, Camden, Me., 103; from James Humphreys, Dedham, 5; from Marc Thrane, Kenosha, Wis., 16; from The Index office, 27; from Edwin Brown, Boston, 24; from R. H. Moulton, Newton, Mass., 38. Total for the week—203.

New associations of a liberal character have recently been formed in Cairo and Morrison, Illinois, and in some other places. To avoid misunderstanding, it is well to state that the "List of Liberal Leagues" is intended to include only such associations as are specially organized to aid in securing compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism." But we are glad to see movements of any kind looking towards the furtherance of radical ideas.

A special meeting of the Second Radical Club was held April 4, to consider the subject of prison reform. Testimony from many parties, of a most convincing kind, was presented for consideration, showing that the State Prison at Charlestown needs a thorough overhauling, in order to secure the abolition of gross and cruel maltreatment of the prisoners. So far as we could learn, the evils of the present system are traceable to the possession of almost despotic and irresponsible power by the Warden, to a wretchedly ineffective system of Prison Inspection, and to the absence of any proper care for discharged convicts. It is greatly to be hoped that some definite reformatory measures may grow out of the present agitation of the subject.

A correspondent in Portland, Maine, sends the following amusing item of news, which well illustrates one of the two tendencies embraced under the name Unitarianism: "'The Holy Eucharist will be celebrated at the First Parish (Unitarian) Church on Good Friday evening, at 7 1-2 o'clock.' I think some of the Portland Unitarians opened their eyes a little when Dr. Hill made this announcement from the pulpit; and a goodly number were heard inquiring, as they passed out—'What the devil is the Holy Eucharist?'—some of them even supposing it to be an invitation to a game of euchre in the vestry, as it was on Friday evening. Something ought to be done to enlighten us here in matters of this kind. Who knows but we shall be invited to eat 'Easter eggs,' from the communion table next? One of our daily papers quietly remarks that 'the First Parish is being slowly tugged up the Hill into Orthodoxy.'"

THE PRAYING CRUSADE.

Superstition is never more hurtful than when it makes reform ridiculous. This is the thought impressed on our mind by the "women's temperance crusade" more deeply than any other, and it gives rise to two or three suggestions.

That intemperance is one of the greatest evils that afflict mankind, and that we so consider it, no reader of The Index who at all appreciates its spirit needs to be assured. Whatever de-rationalizes man is a sworn foe to all rationalism; and the truest friend of reason is necessarily the best friend of genuine temperance. This is so evident that we do not intend to make any unnecessary protestations of devotion to the cause of humanity as against bestiality in the matter of eating and drinking. Let that be taken for granted.

Nevertheless we have had very little sympathy with the temperance revivalism that has been sweeping over the West. It is only a new phase of the prohibitory movement—prohibition taking a religious instead of a statutory form. Much as we respect the motives of many prohibitionists, their principle seems to us to begin at the wrong end of human nature. Enforced temperance is a very untrustworthy and slippery virtue, liable to break down when least expected. The praying crusade is only a new form of the application of force, and is open to all the general objections against the suppressive system of dealing with vice plus certain other objections peculiar to itself. The great popularity enjoyed for a brief season by Dr. Dio Lewis's movement has come from its being supposed to be a new and efficient form of "moral suasion," whereas it is not moral suasion at all. If the women went to the saloon-keepers in private, and appealed directly to their hearts and consciences, that would be moral suasion; but to hold them up to public reprobation, to annoy, tease, or frighten them into submission, to browbeat them into the abandonment of their business as the only escape from a nuisance, is simply moral coercion. All this is a species of terrorism that cows, if successful, and enrages, if unsuccessful; and the reaction at last developed by such a system, leading to insult and even violence towards the women, is but the natural consequence of a wofully mistaken method. The temperance reform cannot stand under such mistakes very long, but will precipitate a reactionary movement of disastrous effect, unless wiser counsels prevail.

Not only is this fancied application of moral suasion in fact an appeal to the old, worn-out method of moral coercion, but the reliance on prayer as its means is a wretched and ridiculous pretence. What the women pray to is not God, but the saloon-keepers; what they expect to accomplish is a change in them, not in him. The women pray at them, not for or with them; the whole object of the prayer is to drive them, by intimidation or shame or remorse, out of one business into another; and while the apostrophe is verbally to God, it is in reality to the liquor-dealer himself. If the women really relied on the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the heart of the liquor-dealer, they would pray in secret, as Jesus commanded, and not expose themselves to contumely on the public streets, where the scribes and Pharisees alone might be expected to pray. It is plain that prayer is resorted to for the purpose of being heard by the saloon-keeper, not by God, who could hear equally well if the women were at home or in church; and a certain insincerity, or at least inconsistency, which crops out in this way, has been widely discerned, and has tended to destroy all genuine power in this union of ill-concealed prohibitionism with revivalistic fanaticism.

We regret, therefore, this alliance of superstition with honest solicitude to promote reform, which is sure to suffer by it. Reverence for prayer itself, when thus prostituted to unseemly uses, is equally sure to suffer. The ephemeral success of the crusade (for we have the feeblest possible faith in the permanence of its results) will by no means atone for the injury thus done. When not made the vehicle of spiritual mendicancy, but simply of the highest and purest upbreathings and outbreathings of the heart of man, prayer still holds a revered place in the thought of large-minded radicalism. As petition, whether for "temporal" or "spiritual blessings," it is outgrown with the most consistent radicals; it is retreating from public assemblages to the solitudes of the private heart; but it is still, in the noble phrase of Emerson, the "soliloquy of a jubilant and beholding soul," and becomes simply the conscious recognition and inward confession of man's highest relation to the All. Whatever tends to degrade it from this intrinsic dignity and purity, and to convert it into the stratagem of a campaign, strikes a powerful blow at the existence of a sentiment which cannot survive in the presence of disgust. The "praying crusade" will be found by-and-by to have done more to disgust men with religion than to win them to temperance,—to have done more harm as an outburst of fanatical superstition than good as an effort to secure reform. This is our sober estimate of the real results of the "crusade," and it will pass simply for what it is worth.

ARE WE CATHOLICS?

The accompanying letter, which I am permitted to print on condition of omitting the proper names, was written recently to a personal friend and member of my society by a Roman Catholic priest of my neighborhood. The man to whom it is addressed was born and reared a Catholic, and his interest in my views gave uneasiness to his friends of the old Church. To relieve this uneasiness, he wrote to the priest in question, a learned and sincere man, and in reply received the letter which he believes to be an honest expression of opinion. If it is, it furnishes a singular illustration of the proverb that "extremes meet." For, according to this expositor, the Church of Rome is an institution of Free Religion, and the free religious men are its honorable members. We shall be anxious to know how this news will be received by the doctors. If the letter is not sincere, but merely a priestly device to allay a mother's fears and disarm a son's opposition, it furnishes another illustration of priestly cunning, and another proof that "Jesuitism" is not dead.

O. B. F.

——, ——, March, 1874.

Dear Mr. —— :—

Your favor of the 22d inst. grieves me that your mother, whom I so much respect, should have occasion to be troubled about your religious views, or to think that you are no longer within the pale of the Church. Her reasons for so thinking I have no means of knowing, except what I can glean from the contents of your letter. From this I infer that your conception of Catholic doctrine does not accord with the common opinion of Catholics. This is not against you, as the common opinion of Catholics is not always the true one. Catholic doctrine is adaptable to all minds, and as each mind is different in humanity, there is necessarily a subjective difference in the conception of Catholic doctrine. Objectively, truth is the same, being one. If you profess yourself ready to believe all that is of divine Catholic truth as it presents itself to your mind, you are Catholic enough.

But your doubt, or rather your mother's, seems to be about the propriety of following conscience. I can only transcribe the Catholic doctrine on this point. Conscience is the first and highest law of man. St. Bonaventure says: "Conscience is the commander and messenger of God." St. Chrysostom: "This tribunal (conscience) is divine, and is placed by God supreme for us." St. Thomas says: "Conscience binds by virtue of divine precept." Again: "Conscience so binds that he who does not fulfil its commands incurs sin." The Church always recognized this first common principle. She teaches even that an invincibly erroneous conscience, when dictating what is positively wrong, must be followed under pain of sin. Conscience is the rule by which all morality is measured. By it God judges; whatever is against it is sin; whatever accords with it, properly exercised, is virtue. There is no other doctrine tolerated in our Church; everybody must follow conscience, enlightened and intelligently acting.

Now whoever follows conscience is a member of the Church of Christ. No matter what his verbal profession may be—Pagan, Buddhist, Mohammedan—if he follows the voice of conscience, nuntius et præco Dei, he is a Catholic, and as such has ground to hope for salvation.

Of course each one is his own judge in this matter. And here we must admire the dignified freedom which our Church recognizes in the human soul. She does not presume to tell any man that his conscience is right or wrong. This is individual work. The words of an approved author may be cited here: "Those who without any fault are convinced that their's is the true religion, and serve God in justice, are to be reckoned amongst the members of the true Church."

To be concise, taking your letter to be a candid profession of your inward conviction, I can only reply to your questions as follows, according to Catholic teaching:—

1st. Conscience, properly understood, must be obeyed in all cases; and hence

2d. Whoever follows the dictates of this right conscience must be considered a member of the Catholic Church; and as such

3d. He has a right to the common hope of salvation, which such membership holds out; and

4th. As long as he loves the supreme good, he cannot be lost.

It is, of course, for each person to apply these principles to his individual case. If you have doubts about your proper understanding of these principles, it is your duty to seek light for their removal. If you are convinced that you have this right view of particular dogmas explicable by these principles, I see no reason why you should be disturbed in the enjoyment of conscientious intellectual freedom, in which the Church protects you. Your mother's anxiety is very natural and proper, as every parent loves her child

It is also your duty to love her by a proper appreciation of her solicitude.

If these few lines shall be of any service to anybody, they are at your disposal to use as you like. If there is something yet not satisfactorily explained, I shall find pleasure in endeavoring to supply the defect.

Meanwhile, believe me yours very truly,

——— ———.

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—The old and the new countries are now so united that they exercise upon each other a very powerful influence. We catch each other's opinions, and are stirred often by a mutual enthusiasm—for good or for evil.

An instance of this may be seen in the creeping into our literature of an idea which originated in America, relating to the subject of marriage ties.

"Free love," as it is called, though at present very difficult to define, is stealing its way into our books and journals, but not yet with sufficient boldness and definiteness to excite alarm amongst our somewhat sluggish and conservative people. I do not know how widely this new moral heresy may be spreading in America, if indeed it be spreading at all. But I think it will not be unseasonable to make a loud and solemn protest against "free love," in the name of many free thinkers on both sides of the Atlantic.

First, we are all agreed that people who hate each other, and to whom it has become impossible to live together without danger of some tragedy, ought to separate forthwith; and that, if the separation be final, each person should be permitted to marry again, provided a congenial partner can be found.

We are not amongst the number of ecclesiastics and rigid church people who regard matrimony as an inexorable bond, which only death ought to sever, and which is to be endured, at the cost of everything which renders life bearable, to the end of one's life. The law amply provides for separation in such cases by the divorce courts and by mutual agreement. There does not seem any valid objection to permitting persons so separated to marry again, if they please.

But thus far and no farther can we go with the "free lovers." It is difficult to write with becoming patience about their sickly nonsense, and their retrograde views.

The world has been long enough discovering the errors of polygamy and polyandry. The former proved to be fatal to domestic peace and the right rearing and training of children; the latter proved to be contrary to the laws of Nature by being always punished by foul disease. Polygamy is not unnatural to man as a beast; it is only inimical to his interests as a man. Polyandry, on the other hand, is a physical error branded by Nature's rod as an unpermissible folly.

There is left to us only the alternative of monogamy, which the higher branches of the human race pronounce to be best for man as man. Are we, at the bidding of these dreamers, to unlearn all the experience so dearly bought, and to lapse into either of the customs already condemned? For that is what must be the result of this playing with the fire of sexual passion.

To conceal from themselves or from the world the real issue, the advocates of "free love" babble of "pure loves" between persons of opposite sex who are not brothers and sisters, pretending that the attachment is to be purely Platonic, etc. They cry out for this as if we had not enough and to spare of such love already—only we generally call it friendship. There are hundreds and thousands of us men and women who are warmly attached to each other in bonds of such friendly affection; some married, some unmarried, their condition in this respect making no possible difference to the degree of their attachment. Now, if this pure love, or friendship as I prefer to call it, is what they want, and only that, then I say they are wasting their foolish breath in demanding what they all have, and we all have, already abundantly. The heart of man long ago found out its varied powers of affection, and has exercised them for centuries and centuries to his joy and well-being. We have plenty of this "free love" already, and the agitation professedly designed to promote it is an insane waste of breath and energy.

Do Mrs. Woodhull and Dr. Nichols think we are such dolts as not to see through this flimsy disguise? Are we made of cardboard and stuffed with rags, so that we have lost all instincts as sexual beings—not to know the real feelings which lurk behind this cry for "free love"?

The lady herself actually penetrates the holy of holies of the matrimonial temple in her unblushing demands as to the procreation of children; and really she must blame herself, if the world of men and women, with veins full of warm human blood, cannot guess what she is driving at.

It would indeed be going back from all moral conquest into the laxity of the savages to sanction the sort of love-making which these people would demand.

Persons of opposite sex, married or unmarried, would find nature too strong for them, if they went to wooing and cooing, fondling and caressing, as, it must be confessed, is very pleasant to the natural man—and woman. We know what this sort of Platonic affection generally ends in, and how often really innocent persons have been pushed over the precipice before they were aware of their danger.

If Mrs. Woodhull demands that every woman shall have the right to choose for the father of her child the man whom she loves best, then, if her husband have wearied or affronted her, she has nothing to do but to become what the good old Bible taught us to call an adulteress; a person in a state usually considered, by all good men and women, to be foul and degraded. In like manner the husband may leave the wife, who has comforted him all along till age has withered her charms, and betake himself for his own animal pleasure to any young woman he chooses to fancy!

Now this is a step—nay, a wide leap—backwards from the standard of morality already reached. It is hard enough for some of us to preserve our chastity and fidelity, as it is, without being encouraged, invited, and besought to lay down our virtue and embrace bestiality as a boon of enlightenment and freedom!

God forbid! Let the creatures who want to sell their nobler part to the gratification of sensual desire do so if they must; but how dare they come forward before a world too little chastened, and poison the air with their nasty theories! For very shame they ought to keep their evil deeds for the darkness of night and the silence of the sepulchre.

It is an outrage on that portion of humanity which has painfully learned the lessons of virtue, and still more painfully obeys them, for adulterers and adulteresses to be glorying in their shame, and making even a new religion of their unbridled lust.

Are we men or are we beasts? Are we to go on in the path of humanity lighted by the stern teachings of history and by the nobler sentiments that make us men, or are we to go backwards and downwards into the mire from which we have escaped, and, dethroning reason, conscience, and affection, to yield ourselves to the wild indulgence of the most imperious of our passions? Will they tell us that this is not what they want? Then I reply, "Out upon ye, we are not fools!"

I am, sir, very truly yours,

Charles Voysey.

IS IT A "PIOUS FRAUD"?

The Ninth Annual Report of the Consumptives' Home, of Boston, bringing the records of that institution down to September 30, 1873, deserves a peculiar notice. Dr. Charles Cullis, its conductor, who publishes this Report, says explicitly: "There is no Fund, Endowment, or known Pecuniary Provision whatever existing for the support of the Home; no human friend of it who has ever made any promise, express or implied, to preserve it or relieve its necessities; and no person in any way connected with Dr. Cullis who has the control of means sufficient to do more than render small contributions towards its maintenance." Again: "All has been done without any appeal to man for aid, but by simple reliance upon God's word,—in prayer day by day,—many times a day, asking God to fulfil his promises to us." Now Dr. Cullis states that in April last his health began to fail, and goes on to say: "Friends, hearing of my desire to go from home for rest, are sending sums of money for that purpose. It is proposed that I sail for Europe with my wife and daughter."

On May 13, he records receiving "upwards of two hundred dollars" towards his "travelling expenses."

On May 15, he wrote: "Over one thousand dollars have been sent me up to this time, and our passages are engaged for the 20th. To-day I have received four thousand dollars, this being part of a legacy left by a lady of this city for the Home, the remainder of which I expect to receive before leaving. Thus is our wonder-working God relieving me from all care, and indicating His will. Only so very near the moment of departure has this help [for the Home, or for Dr. Cullis?] arrived. But my dear wife, in her careful solicitude for me, has had the strongest faith in this matter, and has made all preparation, though the way seemed dark. She had the assurance that God would give all that we needed," etc., etc.

On May 19, he received $2,000 more of this legacy, and wrote that $1,221.67 would be paid in a few days. After paying various obligations, a balance of $1,050 would remain. The next entry is on September 16, announcing his return from Europe.

Contributed in this way, Dr. Cullis reports a total of $29,153.87 for the year,—all sent by charitable people on behalf of the Home, in response to prayer and without "any appeal to man." Out of this sum, apparently, were paid the expenses of a three months' trip to Europe for himself, wife, and daughter.

Now the public ought to know a little more about this wonderful and widely advertised "Work of Faith," so often quoted as an American parallel to George Müller's Orphan Asylum in Bristol, England, which also is declared (notwithstanding the most cunning system of advertising ever practised) to be supported solely by "answers to prayer." We have been informed, on what we consider the best authority, that a few years ago Dr. Cullis married a widow lady who had in her own right $100,000, and that she now receives an income of about $600 a month. Our informant added that he himself paid to Dr. Cullis, soon after his marriage, $12,500 in one cheque on his wife's account.

Read the foregoing unctuous story once more in the light of these statements, and ask yourself whether Dr. Cullis is better entitled to receive lavish donations from credulous and superstitious dupes, or immediate attention from the police as a getter of money under false pretences.

The Sacred Anthology. A Book of Ethnical Scriptures. Collected and Edited by Moncure D. Conway. London: Trübner & Co. 1874.

Here is a book which has long been needed, and one which the "sympathy of religions" was sure to bring. With the exception of a few bits chiefly from the Scandinavian myths, it is an anthology of Asian Scriptures only, i.e., Parsee, Hindu, Buddhist, Chinese, Hebrew, and Christian, Arabian (Sabæan, and Mohammedan), and the mediæval Persian poets. About ninety authorities in all,—the best translations and treatises,—furnish the sources of selection. The passages elect number seven hundred and forty, and are arranged in twenty sections entitled respectively: Laws, Religion, Theism, Worship, Wisdom, Superstition, Knowledge, Ethics of the Intellect, Charity, Love and Friendship, Nature, Man, Character, Conduct of Life, Humility, Greatness, Justice and Government, Action, Sorrow and Death, Sanctions.

To say it is the best book of the kind in English is little praise, its forerunners have been so very few. We gratefully welcome the opportunity made so convenient for tracing the essential unity of moral ideals and of religious feeling in the great ethnic faiths. The ideal man of the different pictures is everywhere nearly the same man. Here are Hebrew, Christian, Buddhist, Chinese, Hindu, and Sabæan versions of the Golden Rule. Persian, Mohammedan, Hindu, Buddhist, Hebrew, and Chinese praise as distinctly, if not as glowingly, as the Christian the nobleness of him who returns Good for Evil. Across the continent, and across six hundred years, Lao Tsze and Jesus echo each other's words about childlikeness and humility. Loyalty to right at all cost is as absolutely affirmed by Confucius, Valmîki, and the Persian poets, as by Paul; and the belief that "the world fights for the righteous man," that "one with God is a majority," resounds again and again from every side. Some fine Hindu passages contrast the worth of the right deed and the inwardness of real religion with the emptiness of its outward observance. The certainty of retribution for evil, and the imperishable record of one's slightest good deed as well, are assured with equal emphasis by Persian, Hebrew, Christian, and Mohammedan. It is a Chinese Buddhist who says, "Never will I seek, never receive, private, individual salvation, never enter into final peace alone." It is a Persian sceptic who says, "Fear not; they cry that on the last day the dear God will give himself up to wrath. But from goodness itself only goodness can emanate. The end shall be full of sweetness." It is a Hindu Scripture which says, "A Veda void of mercy is a Holy Scripture only in name."

The first section, "Laws," contains a long parallel between the characteristic doctrines of the Sermon on the Mount and the sayings of Talmudic teachers. In the second, and scattered elsewhere through the book, occur many large-minded utterances about catholicity in religion; and notably the most telling are Koranic and Persian. It is not surprising, however, that under "Theism" the Persian mystics are the most impressive in their recognition of the Unknown, Inevitable One, the God in Nature, in us, in all,—the Love, the Justice, the Reason, the Near Refuge; for, when Theism rises to its highest vision, it necessarily borders on Pantheism. The Hindu, therefore, can give us much for this section, and the Hebrew some grand verses, the Christian and Mohammedan but little, the Chinese and Buddhist hardly anything—or only under a different name. Fine thoughts throng in the sec tions headed "Charity," "Sorrow and Death," and "Sanctions." "Superstition" contains a many-voiced denunciation of traditional religion, formalism, hypocrisy, and priestcraft; and "Ethics of the Intellect" describes the true prophet's character and career, fidelity to truth and higher law, the ordeal, the martyrdom.

The essential unity of all the ideals and faiths is one fact made plain by such a compilation. The ethnic Bibles differ not by the kind so much as by the proportioning of their elements, by their comparative silences and emphases; and the contrast in this respect is less than is commonly supposed. Yet there is contrast. And a second fact, attested by this Anthology at least, is the general preëminence of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. In both the last-named sections, for instance, the most frequent, the longest, the best passages come from the words and life of Jesus and his follower Paul, as if Jesus stood out in history as the great type of radical, and reformer, and martyr. Perhaps it is because we know our Bible best, and can read between the passages selected from it,—but at any rate, as we read them, the enthusiasm of love and active unselfing nowhere else keeps at such a constant height, it seems to us, as in the New Testament. While all the Scriptures magnify the good life, the yearning to have personal sin overcome by personal holiness in self and in society seems to exceed here; and while other Scriptures are more aglow with religious mysticism,—the feeling of the One in all,—none seem to keep man's soul at once so free an individual, and yet so bound to God; so much, therefore, in that healthiest of attitudes, that of a loyal lover ardently and trustingly self-striving for the Highest. Whittier writes:—

> "We search the world for truth; we cull
> The good, the pure, the beautiful,
> From graven stone and written scroll,
> From all old flower-fields of the soul;
> And, weary seekers of the best,
> We come back laden from our quest,
> To find that all the sages said
> Is in the Book our mothers read."

Not all; there are emphases and thoughts in which our Bible falls below what we find elsewhere; but the testimony of a collection like this goes to show that Whittier's words are very largely true. Our Bible, i.e., the Hebrew and Christian sources, furnish thirty per cent. of Conway's extracts, and full forty per cent. of his pages. Next to them he borrows from the Persian poets and mystics, who give a quarter part of all the passages. Hindu Scriptures give nineteen per cent.; Arabian, Buddhist, and Chinese about six per cent. each.

Yet, in spite of our gratitude for this Anthology and of our enjoyment over it, we confess to feeling disappointment. No books are so welcome in expectation as books of "Best Things" selected, and few so disappointing when received. You feel grateful, but not so freshened as you hoped to be. You are in a museum; these are specimens, and you discover that for joy one must find his gems in situ, and light on his own flowers where they grow,—even if this involves plodding over dreary tracts of reading. Keats could hardly have uttered that splendid tribute,—"Things real, —as suns, and stars, and passages of Shakspeare," if he had only known Shakespeare from Dodd's Beauties. The Bible is not in the Concordance. It is not the fault of Dodd, or Cruden, or the gatherer of anthologies,—only a fact concerning herbaria as contrasted with the actual "flower-fields of the soul."

But, besides this, our Bible of Bibles, our book grand and holy, cannot be gathered together at one or at two trials. Mr. Conway's volume comes with nobler presence than its heralds, but it is itself only a herald of what we need and yet shall have. The arrangement is a very important element in such a book, and the arrangement of this is not so successful as it might be. The leading titles should be more distinctive, and under each section the sentences could be grouped with more telling effect and more convenience for purposes of reference and comparison. As it is, within a section, we are led confusedly backwards and forwards from one topic to another, and one religion to another; and three or four of the sections are so meagre by themselves, or else so mixed up in their contents, that they might advantageously be broken to pieces and distributed under others. As to the material of the book, the preface tells us that the aim has been to separate the more universal and enduring treasures, contained in ancient Scriptures, from what seemed chiefly local or temporary, from the rust of superstition and the ore of ritual; and that the selections, beyond those from our Bible, are confined to the Scriptures least accessible to European readers. But the sifting might have been made still more thorough with good result. Not all here seems so impressive as to merit a place in the Coming Book. And readers—not deep students, but those who have merely read the common, well-known books on ethnic religions published during the last dozen years—will be disappointed at not finding more best things still unfamiliar to them. It may be that most of the best things have been already published. If so, the disappointment is still greater.

At best, however, this is but an Asian anthology. Now some one must supplement it with a volume of the highest religious thought of Greece and Rome. Pythagoras, and the Eleatics, the three great dramatists, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, and Epicurus; and then Cicero and the Roman Stoics can certainly be no more spared from our book than Saadi and Omar Khaygám, or even than those elder writings whose unknown origin helps them to the title of "Scripture." Indeed, for statements long and thoughtful in their nobleness, this would probably be the part of our book most often read. What more charming year's work for some little band of friends at leisure—they need not now be scholars, but they must have fine taste—than to gather together his second volume; agreeing, first, most carefully upon the plan of topics, then studying each a separate author, and choosing out his supreme utterances, to be submitted to monthly councils of the whole, and tested by the general delight and reverence before admission to the canon.

We can best render thanks to Mr. Conway by quoting some of his fine passages. They can only be selected from the shorter ones. W. C. G.

THE FOSTER PROTEST.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I give up whatever advantage there may be in your phrase, "should not tax them in full," over mine, "exempt in part." But, as a practical question, I wish to ask, Had Mr. Foster a right to refuse to pay taxes at all, on the ground that his wife could not vote? This I understood you to justify. It is a serious practical question. Conscientious women are writing to the Woman's Journal to ask whether they ought to refuse payment of taxes on the same ground. The question is one that comes close home. The house I live in is the legal property of my wife; ought I to do as Mr. Foster does—take the law into my own hands, and challenge anybody to incur the odium of turning me out of doors?

Besides, the law gives me "imperfect protection." The house was entered by thieves last summer, and some valuable things were stolen. Till I read your argument, it had not occurred to me that this might justify resistance to the tax-gatherer. I have always supposed it a citizen's duty to bear his share of the general burdens for the general good. And the "right" of the government to impose them, I consider, depends wholly on the fidelity with which the government does its task—not on the share of power which it puts individually in my hands.

I have no quarrel with Mr. Foster. On the contrary I have a high respect for his character, his past services, and what I presume to be his motives. But I think he makes a great and very mischievous mistake. Of course I do not censure a man's willingness to suffer, in his own way, for what he thinks a just cause. But the rightness of the act I could not concede except on principles which would put any government at all out of the question, by making every good man—that is, practically, every man—the judge in his own case of how far the government does its duty by him, and how much he owes to its support.

It was because I was sorry to see THE INDEX apparently falling into the current of mischievous and flagrant nonsense on this subject that I wrote my first note. I am happy to find that the grand-sounding maxim, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," whittles down to the harmless proposal that women should be less heavily taxed than men.

Yours truly, J. H. A.

[1. If we are correctly informed, Mr. and Mrs. Foster had a joint ownership in their homestead. Mr. Foster could not pay the taxes on it without paying them for his wife as well as himself. We consider that he did right not to insist on doing this against her will; for we presume that the protest came originally from her. In Mr. A.'s case, the house he lives in being his wife's, we do not see that he is called upon to do anything about the taxes, in one way or the other; it is for her to pay them or refuse to pay them, as she judges right.

2. It would greatly increase the efficiency of the police system to hold the State liable for individual losses by burglary. It is now liable for destruction of property by mobs; and we see no reason why it should not be equally liable for loss of property by burglars. If every policeman should be promptly discharged within whose beat a case of burglary occurred, the capital invested in the burglar-business would become a very poor investment,—especially if the State also had to make good the loss involved. Meanwhile it is perfectly clear that taxes are not justly due, unless the protection they pay for is afforded; and we should defend Mr. A. as promptly as we have defended Mrs. Foster, if he saw fit to refuse payment of his taxes on this ground. We see no reason why the State should not be held as strictly to its duty as is the citizen to his,—a principle which Mr. A. does not seem to appreciate at all.

3. Whose fault is it, if injustice by the State leads to protest by the citizen, and consequent disturbance? Is it not the State's? The "mischievous mistake" is that of the party committing the injustice, not that of the party who is stung by it into protest. When moralists are wise enough to preach non-aggression instead of non-resistance, there will be no need of non-resistance at all. Nobody has proposed that every man shall be "judge in his own case" as to his obligations to the government, and vice versa; an upright and wise judiciary should be the judge recognized by both parties. Such a judiciary would not forget that the State owes something to the citizen in return for the taxes it collects from him.

4. Which of the two opinions is the more "mischievous and flagrant nonsense"—the opinion that the State owes protection in return for taxation, and the opinion that it is "the citizen's duty to bear his share of the general burden for the general good," without asking any impertinent questions as to what return is made by the State for the taxes it exacts—we leave to the clear heads of our readers to decide. We do not shrink from the comparison.

5. Whether women ought to refuse paying their taxes, or rather a part of them, because they are not allowed to vote, nobody should presume to determine but the women themselves. This must depend on the keenness of their own sense of being wronged. That they are wronged, is evident; that they would be wise in protesting in this way, is doubtful. We must respect the courage and moral convictions of those who do, while we think there are better ways of protesting than this. Nevertheless, if all women should feel the wrong so deeply as to suffer their homes to be sold over their heads rather than submit, does any one doubt that the days of woman's disfranchisement would speedily come to an end? It is the certainty that only a few women would sacrifice so much for their rights, that makes us consider it wiser for the few to pay under protest than to protest without paying, and meanwhile to trust to the power of argument and moral appeal. If they choose voluntarily, however, to suffer, not for the sake of notoriety, but for the sake of their sisters and the promotion of the common cause, we have only admiration and sympathy to express for their self-sacrifice. THE INDEX must stand for the sanctity of individual rights, even against the State, and must treat with profound respect that uncompromising spirit, either in man or woman, which cannot brook to submit voluntarily to a wrong.—ED.]

THE TEMPERANCE REVIVAL.

MR. EDITOR:—

In THE INDEX for February 12, under the head of "Glimpses," is a reference to the women's temperance movement in Hillsboro, Ohio, as "the new device for killing intemperance."

To those who obtain their information of this woman's temperance movement by personal observation, or from the fair notices that are usually published in the newspapers, your "Glimpse" seems painfully unjust. With the first notice of the work of the "Crusaders" in Hillsboro and other places is the cheering intelligence that their efforts are successful in closing saloons and suppressing intemperance; and that, so far, it is the most successful and thorough temperance work ever inaugurated. Any person who understands the philosophy of the human mind can comprehend the influence one mind can exert over another by kindly, sympathetic praying and pleading for what is known to be right, or what is felt to be wrong; and when religious influences are used for the suppression of vice and improvement of humanity, they are entitled to fair and respectful references, especially from representatives of "liberal," cultivated thought. Your statement that, "whenever one of these valorous Christians in the church, who send out their women to fight in their stead while they themselves keep out of danger, concludes a prayer, the church-bell is rung, to let the women know that the men have not adjourned to some one of the just-visited saloons," and that "they think it safer to do all the visiting themselves," is a more gross and untruthful representation of the temperance principles and integrity of the temperance men that are sustaining this movement, and estimation in which they are held by these coworkers, than has ever been made against them. The workers in this cause need no defence from me, and do not deserve such injustice from you. For when religionists exercise their influence to suppress vice and elevate humanity, representatives of liberal thought cannot well afford to disseminate and manifest more hatred for them, or their religion, than they do for the vices they are destroying, if that vice is the great national curse of intemperance. I had hoped that the success of this movement in Ohio and elsewhere in suppressing intemperance, which has been so generally fairly reported by the press, would have induced you to refer to this reform more fairly; but up to this date, THE INDEX does not point in that direction. C. S. S. GRIFFING.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, March 2, 1874.

[When we jotted down the hasty paragraph above censured, we supposed that the Hillsboro manifestation was purely sporadic, an outburst of local revivalism. Since then it has assumed large proportions; although the feature which appeared especially ludicrous, the ringing of the church-bell to inform the women that a prayer had just been concluded in the men's prayer-meeting, does not seem to have been repeated. We are sorry that the satire aimed at this preposterous violation of Jesus' command to pray in "the closet," and to "shut the door" at that, should be so totally misunderstood, as if aimed at the sincere desire to reform the great evil of intemperance—an evil so universally recognized that every decent person deplores it.—ED.]

THE MOTE AND THE BEAM.

BY C. K. WHIPPLE.

LAWYER.—Full damages must be paid.
FARMER.—Did I mention that it was your bull that gored my ox?
LAWYER.—Oh! that alters the case.

It is astonishing in how many and what various instances the case is "altered" by proprietorship or partisanship. We all laugh at the lawyer in the fable, but we all imitate his example when our interests, or those of our sect or party, are concerned.

We had news on March 17 that an American missionary, sent out by a Boston Association to convert the Roman Catholics in a Mexican city, had just been murdered there by an infuriated mob. The Protestant reporter who forwarded this news added that the mob were incited to this outrage by a Roman Catholic priest, who advised the extermination of all Protestants.

When the Ursuline school and convent, near Boston, was sacked and burned at midnight by a Protestant mob on August 11, 1834, probably all Roman Catholics attributed this outrage to the strenuous efforts which had been made for some months previously by Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher, in the principal towns and cities of the Atlantic coast of New England, to represent the Roman Catholic faith, and the immigrants who held it, and the priests who taught it, and above all the schools where it was taught, as dangerous and pernicious. His famous and oft-repeated lecture, entitled "A Plea for the West," was written expressly to teach this doctrine, and the Roman Catholics not unnaturally supposed a connection between the outbreak of popular rage against them on that terrible night, and the repetition of that inflammatory discourse in Boston that very Monday evening, a few hours before the mob commmenced operations.

In both the cases above mentioned, no doubt, the mob went further than those who had inflamed their prejudices and passions expected or desired. But rage, especially the rage engendered by theological rivalry, can no more be restrained within pre-arranged limits, than a barrel of gunpowder can be burned half-way down.

Bloody persecution for differences of theological opinion has been often practised both by Catholics and Protestants, and as often disclaimed by each; yet, strange to say, each persists in claiming, as divinely inspired, representations of God himself as having, in former times, commanded men to kill their fellow-men without mercy or pity, expressly on accouut of differences in religious belief.

This year, so far, has been noted for the unusual number and the widespreading influence of "revivals of religion," the managers of which assume, and require their converts to believe, that every portion of the Bible is "the Word of God." Not only is this insisted on as a general proposition, but special emphasis is sometimes given to passages of Scripture which seem most antagonistic to that view of the relation of God to men, and of men to each other, which Jesus taught; though these exhorters claim to be followers and even ambassadors of Jesus.

One of the eminent persons who systematically uses this method is Rev. A. B. Earle, a professional revivalist of thirty years' standing, still operating in that capacity (just now in Canandaigua, N.Y.), and still in great request and high repute. From his lips, while he was engineering a revival in Park Street Church, some years ago, I noted down the method of operation now to be described.

Two of Mr. Earle's favorite passages of the Bible, read, when the excitement he has raised has reached its appropriate stage, to prepare for the inculcation of "self-consecration" and of "faith," are narratives of the unprovoked killing by the children of Levi of three thousand of their Hebrew brethren, on the representation of Moses that God commanded it, and of the marauding expedition of the Hebrew host against Jericho, undertaken for the express purpose of killing every living thing in that city, "both man and woman, young and old, and ox, sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword," on the representation of Joshua that God commanded it. The former of these transactions is related as follows:—

"Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, Who is on the Lord's side? Let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him. And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor. And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses; and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men. For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves to-day to the Lord, even every man upon his son and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day." (Exodus xxxii., 26–29.)

Mr. Earle, though austere in appearance, seems kind-hearted, and teaches that men in these days should treat each other kindly, even in case of the extremest diversity of religious opinion and practice, as if he thought that God would have them act thus. But, in reading the barbarous command and the barbarous execution of it above quoted, resulting solely from a difference of religious opinion and practice, he not only seemed utterly unconscious of the truth that such orders could not have come from the true God, but he dwelt upon the details with deliberate emphasis, adding, at the close of that record of ferocious slaughter, "This was the consecration."

Mr. Earle represents to his hearers that he holds a conversational intimacy with the Deity, exactly such as the Old Testament claims for Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, and Elijah. Suppose he should go a step further. Suppose he should tell an individual convert that Jehovah commands him, as an evidence of faith and obedience, to cut the throat of his only son! Suppose he had told the whole body of his converts in Park Street Church that Jehovah commanded them to take weapons, and go out and "consecrate themselves" upon such Unitarians, and Universalists, and Spiritualists as they might meet in the streets of Boston, to the number of three thousand! They would utterly have refused, in spite of the example of similar consecration, for a similar diversity of religious belief and practice, read to them from the Old Testament as the positive command of the same Jehovah. The customs of Park Street do not go so far as that. Even when, on the afternoon of Saturday, March 6, 1858, in the course of a revival engineered by Mr. Finney, about forty persons assembled in Park Street vestry to pray that God would "remove" Theodore Parker out of the way—or else "send confusion and distraction into his study"—or else "confound him, so that he shall not be able to speak" when he next entered the pulpit,—probably no one of those devout imprecators thought of "consecrating himself" upon Mr. Parker by smiting him under the fifth rib. Times have changed very much since the Old Testament period. But my point is that, if Mr. Earle or Mr. Finney had chosen to enjoin such action in God's name, their Park Street converts would have had precisely the same reason for literal obedience as the Hebrews had for obeying the command of Joshua. Are we to do a cruel and wicked thing because a man in whom we have confidence declares that God commands it? The Hebrews voted "yes," and did it; though some of them probably felt a sensation of repugnance while butchering the little babies of Jericho and their mothers. The people of Park Street would vote "no," even if Mr. Earle should declare that God commanded this sort of "consecration" on their part. They would doubt even Mr. Earle first. Yet, strange to say, not one of them seems to suspect that the Hebrews ought to have doubted Joshua! The rectitude of that transaction is swallowed whole, without question, through faith in the divine mission of Joshua. But should not faith be exercised rather in God than in Joshua? Rather in God than in the unknown writer of "the Book of Joshua"? Rather in God than in any writer or speaker who attributes to the Divine Being things clearly unworthy of Him? Is it not time for us to take the responsibility of rejecting all such representations of God, spoken or written, as impute to Him even favoritism in dealing with his human children? Still more, statements declaring that He ever enjoined some of them to hate and kill others!

IN ANCIENT TIMES

I. Men erected great buildings in which they put immense blocks of stone; each one as large as some modern dwellings. (Bible Dictionary.)

II. They had also great agricultural implements; some of their ploughs were so large as to require twenty-four oxen to draw them. (I. Kings, xix., 19.)

III. They had not only great buildings, and great stones, and great ploughs, but great men and strong men. One of them could pick up and carry a modern stage-coach with its four horses, passengers, and baggage. (Joshua, xvi., 3.)

IV. They had great eaters. One man ate so much at one meal that he needed no more food for six weeks. (I. Kings, xix., 8.)

V. They had great shooters. Some men could shoot with bow and arrow, using only one hand. (I. Chronicles, xii., 2.)

VI. They had great marksmen. In one town there were three hundred men that could throw stones with the left hand, and not miss a hair's breadth. (Judges, xx., 16.)

VII. They had great trappers. One man could catch several hundred wild animals in a few days. (Judges, xv., 5.)

VIII. They had great stone-throwers. A boy could throw a stone with a velocity greater than that of a rifle-ball. (I. Samuel, xvii., 49; see Olmsted's Philosophy, vol. I, page 12, art. 15, ex. 2.)

IX. They had great endurance. Men could live without food or water several weeks in succession. (Deuteronomy, ix., 9, and I. Kings, xix., 8.)

X. They had great fowls. Some could creep, and some had four legs. (Leviticus, xi., 21.)

XI. They had great collections of animals. At one time thousands of them, from all parts of the world, assembled and remained together several months without food or water. (Genesis, vii.)

XII. They had great battles. In one battle one army lost only thirty men; whilst of the other army twenty-five thousand men were killed. (Judges, xx.)

XIII. They had great drinkers. In one village there were three hundred men that lapped water like dogs. (Judges, vii., 6.)

XIV. They had great flocks of birds. On one occasion, during a storm, they were beaten down in such vast numbers as to cover the ground to the depth of three feet, and over a surface equivalent to a strip of land six miles wide and as long as the railroad from New York to Baltimore. (Numbers, xi., 31.)

XV. They had great wealth. One man had money equal in value to $2,714,525,000, besides 4500 tons of silver. (I. Chronicles, xxii., 14.)

XVI. They were great providers. At one time several thousand men went to work, and in thirty-six hours dried about sixty millions of bushels of meat. (Numbers, xi., 32.)

XVII. They were great marchers. At one time a mixed multitude of two millions of men, women, and children, with about two millions of sheep and an immense number of cattle, marched twenty-eight miles in about four hours. (Exodus, xiv., 19–24; xiv., 30; xii., 41, 42–51.) Such a procession, in the present day, could not march through a toll-gate in less than a month.

XVIII. They had great mothers. Some women had one hundred and eighty children, which is equivalent to bearing children every year for thirty years in succession, and averaging five children at a birth. (Numbers, xv., 1; iii., 15–29. For the calculation see The Bible in a Balance, page 107, by Rev. J. G. Fish.) Once in a city of 600,000 inhabitants nearly every woman had a sucking child at the same time. (Jonah, iv., 2.)

XIX. They had great orators. One man could address two millions of people. (Exodus, xxxv., 4; Leviticus, viii., 34, 35.)

XX. They were great stutterers. Forty-two thousand men were put to death because they could not pronounce a certain word. (Judges, xii, 6.)

XXI. They had great curiosities—beasts and reptiles that could talk with human voice. (Numbers, xii., 28; Genesis, iii., 1.)

XXII. They had great obstinacy. One king continued fighting ten years after his death. (In II. Cronicles, xvi., 1, we read that in the thirty-sixth year of Asa, Baasha the king came up against Israel; but in I. Kings, xvi., 8, it is stated that Baasha died in the twenty-sixth year of Asa.)

XXIII. They had great stables. One man owned no less than forty thousand stalls for horses. (I. Kings, iv., 26.)

XXIV. They had great parentage. One man had no father. (Luke, i., 30–35.) Another man had two fathers (compare Matthew, i., 16, with Luke, iii., 23); and another man never had either father or mother. (Hebrews, vii., 1–3.) One man had several sons before he was a year old (compare II. Chronicles, xxi., 20, with II. Chronicles, xxii., 2.)

XXV. They had great cruelty. A peculiar people who claimed to be the special favorites of God showed no mercy to their enemies. (Deuteronomy, vii., 2.) They cut them with saws and axes. (II. Samuel, xii., 31.) They dashed children against rocks, and ripped up women. (II. Kings, viii., 12.) They butchered thousands of widows and infants. (Numbers, xxxi., 17–35.)

XXVI. They had great consanguinity—there were children whose father and grandfather was the same man. (Genesis, xix., 36.)

XXVII. They had great armies. In a kingdom so small that a man could walk across it in twenty-four hours, there was an army of two millions of men. (I. Kings, xii., 21.)

"Puny objectors" who have nothing better than the "beggarly elements" of reason, common sense, and philosophy will declare the above statements absurd; but they that have faith will find no difficulty in believing them, as they are based on Bible authority.

MOBERLY.

HEAVEN via PALESTINE.

Old notions about travel are passing away. People are discovering new routes and new modes of conveyance to the celestial world. Christian crusades and pilgrimages to Jerusalem have almost ceased. Even the Jews, so long hopeful of an abiding place, have abandoned the thought of buying and colonizing the so-called "Holy Land," and the advent of a Messiah at Jerusalem forms no substantial part of their belief; while the Turk, now prowling about the Holy City, deems Mecca more sacred and much nearer Paradise than Jerusalem. The absurdity of the idea that God has any partiality for any land, especially one where so many horrible crimes have been committed in His name, is becoming self-evident to all persons of candor and intelligence. For my own part, I have less reverence for Jerusalem than Boston, and would much rather, could I exercise the preference, die in and depart from the latter city than the former. Boston has never been as wicked and corrupt a city as Jerusalem, and the prospect is she never will be; while as to all those influences which go to make up a higher civilization, the two hundred and forty-four years of Boston's history far outweigh the three thousand years of Jerusalem. I do not believe that Jerusalem has ever been any nearer the celestial world than any other city; but some people think otherwise, and long to visit the Holy Land, even though they should die elsewhere. Such persons fancy that their end will be more peaceful for having trod on "sacred" soil, and doubtless think that this increases their prospect of an introduction and acquaintance with Christ, should they meet him in the other world; for they can then tell him that they have been where he was, and stood in his footprints, and so forth. They forget that Christ will be mortified to learn that there are more infidels than Christians in his native land, and that the Holy Land has gone to rack and ruin. They will also be ashamed to confess that a pleasure excursion took them there. For the same reason that I consider it geographically a roundabout way to the heavenly country, and like, in common phrase, going "round Robin Hood's barn," I consider the Trinity unnecessary, since to attempt to reach God by the mediation of another, or by going through the Holy Ghost, or through Jesus Christ, is a roundabout process to one who prefers the direct road to God. To an intelligent human being it seems far easier to appeal to God directly, or by the mediation of conscience alone, than to attempt to revive a person executed in Palestine two thousand years ago, and then ask for his intercession with the Creator. Each man's conscience is nearer God than Christ is to him; and so long as this is so, there is no necessity for going to heaven via Palestine or via Christ. The enlightened conscience is the shortest avenue and the best conveyance to God and heaven.

GOV. PARKER'S MESSAGE to the legislature of New Jersey states the number of children of school age (5 to 18) at 286,444; of whom 179,443 were last year enrolled in the public schools. The number of teachers employed was 3,131, and the schools were open on an average of nine months and thirteen days.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12		Insertions,	10c per line.
" 13 "	25	"	8	"	"
" 26 "	51	"	6	"	"
" 52		"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE STOCKING of the Republican party seems to be unravelling. See New Hampshire and Connecticut.

THE NEXT MEETING of the Second Radical Club will be held at the house of Rev. Dr. Bartol, 17 Chestnut Street, next Monday evening, April 20. Essay by Dr. Bartol.

LORD RECTOR RALPH WALDO EMERSON! What a title is that for the wise but modest man of Concord to stagger under! And yet the Glasgow University wishes him to assume it.

A FAVORITE song with the Ohio temperance women is "Shall we gather at the river?" This is certainly suggestive of the element they desire to substitute for "strong drink."

WALT WHITMAN, says the New York Tribune, has been invited to deliver the Biennial-Commencement poem at Tuft's College, next June; and he has promised to do so, unless prevented by illness.

INSPIRATION best comes to a man, not through conformity, but through non-conformity. In following others we lose ourselves; it is only when we come to ourselves that we come to God, and truth, and the deepest experiences.

MRS. A. G. WOOLSON read a paper full of earnest and beautiful thought, on "Dress Reform," before the Second Radical Club, last Monday evening, Dr. Bartol, Mrs. Zina Fay Pierce, Mrs. Mary Safford Blake, Miss Hotchkiss, and others followed in an interesting discussion.

MRS. MARY LIVERMORE has had one vote for senator in the Massachusetts Legislature. We think that Mrs. Livermore would by no means appear to disadvantage in the United States Senate. In most of the matters which that body has to consider, she would be the peer (or the peeress) of any man in it.

WHEN SMARTING under pain and a sense of disappointment, Theodore Parker said, resignedly: "I think 'circumstances' are wiser than I; certainly stronger." The wisdom of "circumstances" (God) ought not to be more uncertain than their might; for if they are only strong, then tyranny is enthroned at the centre of the universe!

THE ICELANDERS are to celebrate, on the second day of August next, the thousandth anniversary of the settlement of their island; also their entrance upon a freer political life under the new Constitution and local Self Government just granted to them by the King of Denmark. May their hearts be as warm and peaceful as their climate is cold and tempestuous!

THE NEW Free Religious Society in Providence, R. I., is making excellent progress. They have had regular Sunday services since they began, on the 22d of February, with such men as Gannett, Abbot, Henry James, Sr., Longfellow, Higginson, and Weiss to speak to them; and now they have good singing as well as good speaking. One of their number writes: "We have good reason to thank the God in us for our prosperity so far."

IN THE April number of Lippincott's Magazine, Adolphus Trollope, speaking of the religious opinions of Walter Savage Landor, says: "I do not hesitate to say that Landor was no believer in any of the creeds which are founded on the belief in a written revelation. . . . I remember to have seen many years ago—a long time before I had ever known him—a long letter from him in which he maintained the superiority of the old classical paganism to any of the forms of faith which have superseded it."

GEORGE RIPLEY (we suspect it is he), in the New York Tribune, speaks of Mr. Emerson as "the first philosopher who was at once the creature and exponent of the life of the New World—an American of the Americans—whose thoughts were based on books as those of other scholars, but whose vision and utterances dealt solely with humanity. In the congress of nations, if Plato should be chosen to represent the Greek, Jean Paul the German, or Voltaire become the typical Frenchman, then Emerson would be the American per se, and unmistakably. Not, of course, in personal character, but as the embodiment of our higher drift of thought and its aim."

THE NEW YORK Tribune, speaking of R. W. Emerson, says: "In this swarming American life, made up of every race, creed, and habit under the sun, he sits apart and quiet, and now and then gives us his message. It reaches the profoundest depths of each man's consciousness; it touches every practical detail of his every-day life." This is sublimely true. And we believe that Mr. Emerson, though he has seldom gone on to platforms except to lecture, and never manipulated the machinery of conventions, is yet one of the greatest reformers this country ever has produced. He has silently sown his grand ideas in faith as grand, and they have been the regeneration and inspiration of many.

THE IRISH claim that they are one hundred and fifty thousand strong in the present population of Boston; and the chairman of the Charitable Irish Society of this city, on St. Patrick's day, said that they are also "one-third of the population of the Old Bay State, and, if we can judge anything by statistics, New England would soon be unpeopled were it not for the virtue, fidelity, and purity of the Irish mothers." On this basis of facts, the same orator concludes that "the sceptre is to fall from the descendants of the May Flower to unlineal hands, and the Celtic supersede the Saxon element even on the Rock of Plymouth." It is to be remembered, however, that the Irish born and educated in this country are not the Irish of Ireland; they are both less Irish and less Catholic. And if our citizens but become imbued at last with the true American idea, what matters it of what stock they come? We must not forget that "our country is the world, and our countrymen are all mankind."

A NEGRO, in Georgia, bet ten dollars that George Washington commanded the Union troops at the battle of Bull Run. After due investigation into the history of that little affair, it was decided that the misguided African had lost his money; but in paying it over he sadly yet sagely declared: "Well, dis yer hist'ry bizness is all mixed up anyway." He probably had in mind the somewnat recent extinction of William Tell and Pocahontas. But now a still more modern confirmation of the "mixed" character of the "hist'ry bizness" has turned up. A Mr. Thomas Jones, of Illinois, has written a book on the History of the Man called Christ; and in it he "proves conclusively" that the "crucifixion of Christ was a sham;" that "John the Baptist and Christ were one and the same person;" that this "Christ turned up again as Stephen," being no more killed as Stephen than as John or Jesus; that again he "assumed the name of Saul and then Paul," and that finally he "appeared and was known under the name of Josephus, and writes, in his old age, a history of his times"! This uncertainty of history is enough to discourage anybody from trying to live or have any personal identity at all. Even if you do get fairly born and started in existence, the chances are ten to one that it will be "proved" afterwards that there never was any such man as you. Really, is there no limit to "destructive scepticism"?

"The Land of the White Elephant."

A LECTURE ON BURMAH,

DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF ST. LOUIS, MARCH 15, 1874.

BY R. A. SKUES,

(Late of the Sixty-Ninth British Regiment).

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Tonghoo, our destination, is on the frontier of the King of Burmah's territory, and a large garrison was kept there. It had been a town of considerable importance at one time, and had been strongly fortified under the native rulers by a vast rampart and ditch. There are numerous religious houses and pagodas, and some Buddhist ceremony was constantly going on. In each of the religious houses and about the pagodas are large images of Gaudama, and the delicate attention the Burmese pay to him is in pasting pieces of gold to him, and letting off crackers and squibs under his nose, if they are rich; or if poor, in tying some yellow cloth round him.

When visiting the places of worship, I always found the Burmese civil; and, so far from objecting to my entering them, they let me examine what I liked. Anything which took my fancy or caused me to look astonished seemed to them a grand joke, and they used to get round and gesticulate and laugh. I have passed them while they were praying, which they did kneeling, hands together and pointed to the pagoda; and they sometimes turned round, pointed up to the pagoda, laughed, and resumed their devotion. However, with all their jocularity, their religion has got firm hold of them, and nothing short of pure inability to move will prevent them from leaving their business and repairing to their favorite pagoda to present their offerings and say their prayers.

The Buddhist religion forbids the killing of any kind of animals, but the Burmese would eat animals which had died a natural death. They used to flavor their rice with putrid fish. The mode of preparing this delicacy was to bury a certain amount of fish until it was partly rotten, and then dig it up and eat it as a condiment.

The government kept a large number of elephants for the public service; and on several occasions, on the death of these animals, I saw the Burmans taking away portions of the bodies. There was a great mortality amongst the horses of the batteries of artillery, and it was found necessary, in order to prevent the Burmans taking and eating the diseased carcasses, to throw them into the river. Even then I have known the Rurmans to fish them up.

The poonghee, or priest, has nothing to do with the devotions, nor does he look after the morals of the people. He is like a monk who has separated himself from the world, and laid himself out for the more rigid observance of the laws of Buddha than a secular life would admit. He is taken from the people, and has generally relatives in the village where the kijong or monastery is. On entering the religious order, he says farewell to the outer world, its enjoyments and pleasures, and has to submit himself to his superiors, and pay implicit obedience to the orders and rules of the society to which he has attached himself. At the threshold of the monastery, he has for the last time in this world (unless he changes his mind) parted from his friends and relatives; from this time henceforth they are strangers to him, simply units in the great human family, and nothing more to him. His head is shaved and bereft of all the long hair of which a Burman is so proud. He must no longer wear a gaudy dress, but must content himself with monastic yellow. The day on which he enters is made a sort of carnival before the long Lent which is to last during the rest of his existence. He must eat nothing now after midday, neither must he dance, or sing, or stand in elevated places. He must not touch gold or silver, must subsist on charity, and take what he gets without returning thanks. Confession was once practised, though now in disuse; but the virtues of humanity, self-denial and chastity, are strictly inculcated. Celibacy is a sine qua non. He must have nothing to do with the lady part of humanity in any shape or form; he is not allowed to touch even his mother, to save her life or get her out of a hole, but may hold a stick out to her, if certain she is in danger and no one else is there to assist her.

There are nuns, also, with somewhat similar rules in the other way; but these old ladies need none, as they have arrived at a period when women cease to be dangerous.

The priest undertakes the instruction of the male children; but the females are not regularly instructed. Every Burman can read and cipher in his own language. I was greatly struck by this peculiarity with regard both to Burmans and Hindus. They all have a system, not of compulsory, but of general, education. Already the noble language common to the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the world is being adopted by all classes of Burmans. India has long spoken it; indeed, wherever the Anglo-Saxon has set his foot, there his language has taken root and flourished. The countries in which the English language is spoken contains 9,500,000 square miles, with 300,000,000 of inhabitants. These countries are five times as large as the empire of Darius, and four times as great as that of the Romans in the zenith of their power. In power, the English-speaking countries are a match for the world; while in the intelligence of their people, and the wealth and extent of their dominion, they already greatly excel. The extensions of the United States alone are equal to all those of Russia; and Mexico, Chili, La Plata, must inevitably speak our language, for their red Indian race is no match for our colonists. An edict has been issued in Japan making English the language of that country.

When praying, the Burman joins his hands, palm to palm, and holds them to his forehead with the intended offering between them.

Little toy umbrellas and flowers are favorites, and saucers of oil, with a burning wick in the centre, are laid before their favorite pagodas. The Burman also leaves plates of rice, which feed all the crows and wild dogs in the vicinity.

Custom, almost a religious one, prevails in placing water, in porous, cooling vessels, in some naturally or artificially sheltered spot for the use of the thirsty wayfarer, and is somewhat analogous to our presenting fountains to cities for the purposes of mercy to man and beast. I think a great want in large cities is that of means for dogs to slake their thirst in the streets. Many a poor dog comes in from the country, and is destroyed as mad, when the wretched animal is suffering merely from exhaustion and thirst.

There is a large tree called the traveller's, which produces water when the leaf is broken off; and there is a creeper which grows on the rockiest and driest mountain-side which will furnish a draught of delicious water for the wearied and parched wayfarer.

I noticed in Burmah that extreme poverty was a rarity. Nature is there very bountiful, and the Burman is a happy-go-lucky sort of fellow, who, as a rule, is content to chew his betel-nut, eat his rice, and smoke his cheroot, with little or no thought of tomorrow. I do not remember ever seeing a case of deformity amongst them, and I do not believe they allow deformed children to live, or at any rate they simply let them die by neglect, following a custom similar to that of the Romans.

The Burmans are well-made, active, and upon the whole very good-natured and civil. They are very fond of athletic sports, and in all kinds of amusements a Burman may be said to be the Frenchman of India. Their game of foot-ball is a great favorite, and they are very expert at it. They use a wicker-work ball, very light; and this they keep flying through the air, tossing it to each other with hand, foot, and elbow. They are also good wrestlers.

I went to see one of their boat-races and was entertained by the monk or head man. The rowers took their paddles with a will, and sent their light canoes flying through the water; and the excitement, when the race was nearly won, was intense. To be declared winner, the man in the bow of the boat had to seize a bamboo which was fastened to a buoy in the middle of the river; and if he missed it, whether his boat passed or not, he lost the race. Sometimes the man would fall off into the water, and then the spectators greeted him with shouts of laughter and showers of jokes.

They have also buffalo fights, more amusing than anything else. Nothing at all like the Spanish bull fight and its intense brutality is presented. Two Burmans mount two buffaloes, and pit them against each other. Sometimes they fight, but much oftener one runs away; still it is dangerous work for Mr. Burman. The victor is covered with laurels, paraded round the place, and then, I have no doubt much to his satisfaction, is allowed to return to his pristine occupation of browsing in his native woods.

The povay, or theatrical entertainment, takes place in the evening, and consists of a large number of dolls worked by strings, and is something like "Punch and Judy" on a large scale. The Burmese have not, like the Chinese, a drama whose plays it takes from six to twelve months to act; but one soon gets tired of their less lengthy puppet shows. They belong to the same race as the Siamese and Chinese, and are handsomer and fairer men than either. Some of their women are exceedingly handsome. They are great gamblers, and play away all the money they have got, and very often their children. If a man wins a child, he adopts it as if it were his own, and it is not considered in any way a slave.

The male dress consists of a white jacket, called an engie, and a putso, which is made either of silk or cotton, and much resembles a Scotch plaid. It is folded round the body, and, when the white jacket is not worn, the long end is thrown gracefully over the shoulder. They allow their hair, which is as black as a raven's wing, to grow to a great length, often touching their ankles. Should they commit a crime and be sent to prison, it is all cut off. This is a terrible punishment, for it brands the man as a felon at once, or as a priest who has changed his mind and returned once more to civil life. He dare not appear in his own village in such a state; he is an outcast from society. His hair is sold by some prison official, who gets it as a perquisite, and probably helps to adorn the head of some Burman or other lady.

The Burmese men are elaborately tattooed, and, while undergoing this operation, have to be dosed with opium to deaden the pain. Should an overdose be given by mistake, the tattooing terminates rather abruptly. The breast is generally tattooed red, and the remainder blue.

The Burmese ladies dress their long hair with flowers, and use false hair. This is in its natural state, and not in the shape of chignon, or pad. On great occasions they wear a vast amount of handsome and valuable jewelry, and are as anxious to show themselves as the women of other parts of the East are to conceal themselves. They wear immense earrings, and the lobe of the ear has a large hole to hold the ornament. A Burmese lady dressed up is intrinsically a valuable bundle.

I have never seen ladies smoke so much as the Burmese do, until the other day, when I was in the country in this State, and there found that the chief accomplishments of ladies consisted in chewing and occasionally dipping snuff. Burmese children smoke very early.

I never saw a drunken Burman, nor any violent conduct at their games. They are a jovial set of people, and you would be astonished to witness the jollity with which they said good-by to an old priest at whose funeral ceremony I was present. A few days before this took place, I had entered a monastery where the priest was lying in state, in a coffin filled with honey, and covered with goldleaf. The honey, after doing the duty of preserving the old gentleman, was probably sent to Calcutta to be sold. No white man ever thinks of buying honey there. The body was taken to a large plain outside the city, where there was an altar erected; and there the ceremony of cremation, or burning the corpse, took place.

On the day appointed I went to the rendezvous, and I cannot explain to you how astonished I felt, when I saw the crowd and its preparations for this solemn rite. The whole thing was a novelty to me, but to the Burmans it seemed an immense joke. The whole country appeared to have turned out for a great piece of fun, for a general spree; and instead of its being the occasion of funeral rites for a priest of their religion, you would have thought it was a carnival, a Derby day, a Fourth of July, or a scene in a dancing-garden, where every one was up and out for a lark.

There were jugglers, tumblers, and buffoons, all exciting enthusiasm in their way; and the crowd in general had given themselves up to the most boisterous mirth. Every one appeared to be doing the most ridiculous things possible. In the centre of the plain, on the altar decorated with paper streamers, toy umbrellas, and goldleaf, lay the body of the priest. No one appeared to take the slightest notice of it, except some old women who brought flowers and rice as offerings. All around the body were crackers and packages of gunpowder, and to this pile fire was set, and it was soon in a blaze. When the powder exploded and the fire-works went off, shouts of laughter reëchoed over the plain. The scene was extraordinary, and, when you consider the occasion, it seemed ridiculous. Soon the altar was consumed, and wood was piled on till the body was reduced to ashes.

On returning home, my horse ran away with me, and dashed through the crowd to their great dismay; but, I am happy to say, to the injury of none.

Buddha's family name was Gaudama, and means the Illuminator. He was said to be without a father, but was really the son of a king. He was married, surrounded by every luxury, and kept as far as possible from the sight of all pain and suffering. One day, however, when he was being driven to the Royal Gardens, he saw for the first time an aged man; and, being told by his servants that all, if they lived, would be like that, he said that birth was an evil, if it ended in old age. On another occasion, on seeing a sick person, he went back thoughtful. The king, to banish these thoughts, multiplied his son's pleasures, and doubled the guards around him. But something entered the palace which no guards can keep out. Death came before him. Monks were admitted into the palace; and when Buddha saw one, and found that he devoted himself to religion, he determined to be one himself. He divested himself of his royal robes, and took a farewell look at his old life. Just as he was about to leave it, the birth of his son was announced. This was a new tie; but he broke through it, and withdrew from the palace to become a recluse.

Before finally leaving, he went to his wife's room, where she was sleeping with her arm round the child, and he dare not move it to see the child for fear of waking her. He left the palace in the dress of a beggar, and carried with him a hatchet to chop his wood, a needle to mend his clothes, and a filter to strain the water he drank, lest he should destroy animal life.

It has been often questioned which type of reform was higher—for the reformer to step up or step down; for the carpenter's son to enthrone himself as king of the Jews and of humanity, or for the king's son to forego his throne and make king's wish to be beggars like him.

These two types were embodied in the founders of the two greatest religions in the world, Christianity and Buddhism.

After some years as a monk, Buddha elaborated his four great principles, which have been called the "wheel of the law."

1. He realized the fact of pain.
2. Examining the source of pain, he found it to be unregulated desire.
3. Destruction of pain by self-control.
4. The means of destroying it by the practice of virtue.

The rock-cut writings of King Asoka, dating over two hundred years before the present era, are amongst the oldest Buddhist writings, and from these we learn the thoughts which seemed greatest to this Buddhist king—this Constantine of the new religion.

Buddha's experience was symbolized by the attacks of evil spirits on him in a lonely place. After that ordeal, his heart became firm and pure, full of meekness and compassion. He hesitated awhile to spread truths which few could understand, but he made a solemn vow that he would do so. He began, and his work was not only religious but social.

He had to combat caste. In the lowest caste were those who exercised the callings of executioners and grave-diggers, and by no process of transmigration could they be reborn. Buddha associated himself with, and took the yellow robe of, these poor men. If he was wrong, the mistake would not simply attach to this life, but at his next transmigration, in consequence of his ignoring caste, he would become the meanest insect. A disciple of Buddha, asking a draught of water from a woman of the lowest caste, she, like the woman of Samaria, protested. The disciple said, "I did not ask your caste; I asked for a draught of water." Buddha and his followers, while not saying anything against caste, defied it in practice. He went to Benares, the sacred city of the Hindu, and preached to the poor in the fields. He showed favors to fallen women in their degradation. Afterwards he returned to his palace, and found that his wife had followed his example. Other females of his family, and finally two hundred women, came to the monastery, and made him receive them as fellow-workers.

This institution of Buddhism has lasted over two thousand years, and a Catholic bishop is said to have remarked that Buddhism equalized women with men. One thing is well known, and that is, that Buddhist women occupy a higher and more honorable position than any others in the East.

The great characteristic of Buddha's preaching may be summarized in this one maxim: "If a man does me a wrong, and I respond with love, the fragrance redounds to me, the harm returns to him."

During his whole life he went about doing good, and inculcating the theory of his four laws. He was an exponent of all the noblest principles of human action. He broke down caste, and raised women from a low estate. No form of religion has done so much for the Asiatics as Buddhism.

Buddha's birthday is still kept. There are white-robed guests, and gorgeous banquets, and each guest goes out and brings in a poor beggar woman, takes off her squalid clothing, and puts on her a white banqueting robe.

Asoka tried to find the tomb of Buddha, and at last succeeded. The door opened at his touch, and he found the lamps, which had been lighted two hundred and eighteen years before, still lighted and full of oil. The flowers which decorated the tomb were as fresh and beautiful as when they had been placed there, and the perfume was more exquisite than those in the garden.

Such is the tale believed by good Buddhists, but one which will not bear the scrutiny of this material age.

I must not forget to mention that the ladies appear on elephants, decked out in their best. These young ladies are not very long in bringing a courtship to a matrimonial termination, and the form of marriage is simply that the bridegroom has to pay the lady a certain amount of dowry, which increases in proportion to the amount of beauty she possesses. In case the tastes of the married pair do not agree, they separate, the lady keeping the money and the pair severally, if they choose, contract similar matrimonial arrangements.

The population of Burmah is said to be yearly decreasing, and this is said to be due to the uncertainty of the marriage relation, the consequence of which is to throw the maintenance of the children wholly on the mother. She, to escape this burden, has recourse to the crimes of fœticide and infanticide, or continues suckling a child for an unnaturally long period.

Almost all the travelling is done on elephants, as it is impossible to get through the bush with anything else. In fact, the elephant is useful, and is used in every department of life. He will drag timber, stack it, and perform all the laborious work connected with it with a patience unequalled, and an endurance unsurpassed. He is, however, liable to weaknesses, and this I found out when I was going through the jungle on the back of the steadiest old log-puller I could get.

A herd of wild elephants appeared, and off rushed my beast in an opposite direction, tearing everything off his back, and scattering our guns, etc., all through the woods. We were all on the look-out for this, and made for his tail, by which we dropped to the ground one after the other as fast as we could. No one was hurt; a few things lost and broken were the sole result.

Rich Burmans build houses for travellers, and where these do not exist the priest's house is open. I have often passed a night there. The Burmese are good carpenters and blacksmiths, but they are lazy, and it is a difficult matter to persuade them to work.

To a sportsman or hunter, Burmah is a perfect Elysium. There is nothing that you cannot get in the way of game, large and small. There are tracts of country where there has been no human habitation for years, and here the wild animals have increased indefinitely.

A good many gangs of thieves used to hang about Burmah, but the British authorities "cleaned them out."

Tigers are numerous, and the sport is considered so extremely dangerous that hunting them is generally done in parties of two or more, and then on elephants. Even then accidents occur, notwithstanding all precautions. Sometimes there are isolated cases where men go out alone, attack the tiger single-handed, and come out safely. One case in particular came under my notice.

A young officer, a nephew of Sir Francis Head, who was at one time Governor-General of Canada, came out with me; and, during the voyage to India, I knew that he did not use fire-arms as the rest of us did, and had never even fired a gun. Six months after we arrived in India, he went out, single-handed, and killed eight tigers. Cases like this are extremely rare; indeed, I hardly think that there is another parallel case. There have been cases of old sportsmen killing many a tiger single-handed; but in the end something happened and a tiger killed them.

The elephant, when wild, is also a dangerous creature, and particularly a "rogue elephant" who has been driven from a herd; for he will kill anything and everything he comes across without the slightest provocation. The white elephant belonging to the King of Burmah is said to be five hundred years old. The elephant which carried Warren Hastings, Governor-General of India, over one hundred years ago, and then several centuries old, is at present alive and well in Calcutta. He must have seen some changes in his checkered life.

We have the wild hog, rhinoceros, bison, and all kinds of deer, from one as big as a buffalo down to one not much larger than an ordinary dog. Monkeys and squirrels abound; and birds of the most beautiful and varied plumage are everywhere to be met with. Snakes are numerous and venomous. The most formidable is the hamadryad, the only one which is positively known to attack without provocation. Mr. Mason, an American missionary at Tonghoo, mentions in a work on the natural history of Burmah the following incident:—

"A Burman came across one of these reptiles, and immediately, comprehending his danger, fled away, with a speed which fear could alone create, over hill and dale. He rushed on at headlong speed until he came to a stream, which he crossed. He stopped, thinking himself safe, but there was the reptile swimming the river after him. With abject terror he again started to run, this time having dropped his red turban, upon which, the snake, fortunately for him, vented his fury and disappeared. A bite from this snake kills within half an hour."

The mosquito is well known in Burmah, and bites as viciously as here, or anywhere else. The white ant (unknown, I believe, on this continent) is continually at work at our houses, and at all wood, leather, or other substances you are rash enough to leave in his way. They build cone-like hills of clay, which they cement by some animal substance derived from their bodies. This is in great request for tamping, when blasting stone. The white ant will destroy almost anything but metal, and has been accused of that, when there was a deficiency of silver in the public treasury; but I am afraid the white ants in this case were of a different species. I may mention one instance where a leak occurred in the treasury, and how it was stopped.

An officer, a friend of mine, was in charge of one of the treasuries at Shoay Gheen, or "Golden City;" and it was his duty to count the money at stated times. This he did, but gave the key to his head clerk, who was a Burman. From some source he found out that all was not right, and he told his clerk that upon a certain day he should count the money. The money was there, and this time my friend thought, to make matters sure, he would keep the key himself. The result was as he had anticipated. His clerk was arrested for debt an hour afterwards.

There are missions from the various Christian sects in Burmah; but none of them have converts except the Catholics. If the apostles are still fishers of men, their baits or hooks must be bad in India.

Burmah is rich in gold and precious stones, and has abundance of silver, tin, iron, coal, and mineral oil. In fact, there is no mineral which Burmah does not possess.

Rice is cultivated abundantly, and trodden out by buffaloes, which, according to Eastern custom, are unmuzzled. The farming implements used are of the rudest description. The rice fields are abundantly supplied with water, for during the rainy season the whole country is inundated. Pineapples are plentiful. When you take a pineapple, it is customary to save the green part and plant it. By doing this I had a fine crop of pineapples in my own garden. Other tropical fruits are here in abundance, while vegetables of all kinds are cultivated by the "Heathen Chinee," who is as industrious and hard-working in Burmah as in any other place. There are a great many of the Chinese settled there, engaged in trades and other occupations. Numbers of Hindus and Mahometans come across from India, and engage in different vocations.

The mail was brought to us with the most scrupulous regularity, in canoes manned by from eight to ten rowers, who travelled night and day. A new project has been laid before the government to establish a line of communication between India and China by means of the great water-ways of Burmah, instead of going round through the straits of Malacca. Besides the Irrawaddy there are three other great rivers, the Memam, the Salween, and the Meekong, which all rise in the south-west corner of China. Of these, the Irrawaddy alone is well known; a steamer can proceed up this magnificent river for a thousand miles, and even at that distance the Irrawaddy is a splendid stream, three miles wide at full flood.

Of the other rivers so little is known that no certain opinion can be given regarding them; but it is reasonable to suppose, from their similarity of origin and size, that they also are capable of adding to the convenience of commercial intercourse. The Meekong or Cambooga River is said to be magnificent in volume and wonderful in length of flow. It divides Anam from Siam, and is said by the natives to be navigable for large craft twelve hundred miles from its delta. An immense traffic is carried up and down on the river in boats. Existing maps represent this stream as running right through south-western China, and, for aught I know to the contrary, they may be navigable for steamers of light draft.

The Memam flows through the heart of Siam; but little or nothing is known of its fitness for navigation. The natives only answer for three hundred miles of it.

The merchandise which comes down it consists of drugs, dyes, lacquered wares, gold, silver, and copper. There are splendid forests on its banks, similar to those of the Irrawaddy, of teak, sampan, and sandal-wood. The Siamese are very jealous of their river, and oppose exploration; but a recent visit of the King of Siam to the Governor-General of India has done much to dissipate this prejudice.

The Salween is another river of which little is known, but whose water-shed could be seen from Tonghoo, where I was stationed. On this river there is a tidal wave more formidable than that of the Sitang, reaching to the height of twenty feet.

All this vast river-system is practically unknown at present, for the reports of natives of these countries are perfectly unreliable. The English government are doing their best to take advantage of all communications which may benefit commerce in Burmah. The province has been in the hands of England over twenty years. Before she got it, the Burmese peasant was nothing but a slave, and dared not show his princes or king that he possessed anything, as it was as much as his life was worth to do so. It was astonishing, when he understood the character of the English law and that of the government which administered it, of the inviolability of life and property, how soon wealth began to appear. The men began to wear silk; to do so before brought sentence of death. The women began to indulge in jewelry and finery of all sorts. Rangoon, the chief city, rose from one of huts of bamboo to one of palaces of brick and mortar; and during these years, under the English government, instead of being a lawless, thieving, and marauding race, neighboring village robbing neighboring village, they were as law-abiding a people as any in the world. England, then, brought order out of chaos and harmony out of discord.

My sketch has now come to an end. It has wandered on many occasions from the land of the white elephant; but what of that, if it has been of sufficient interest for you to travel with me over the paths I have trodden long ago, and whose sides are everywhere to me strewn with memories of the past—some of intense pleasure, others of pain—and of some comrade who participated in these scenes, but who has long since passed away?

Have I interested you with the details of this wonderful country and people? If so, I have succeeded as I could have wished, and have made you somewhat of a fellow-traveller of mine.

PRISON REFORM.

At a special meeting of the Second Radical Club, last evening, held at the rooms of the Woman's Club, Mr. James Cotier, known as James Burns, a discharged convict from the State Prison, read a paper which criticised some points in the last report of Warden Chamberlain. He stated that the warden's disapproval of evening schools was unjust, and his deductions unreliable, as he is a very infrequent visitor at the sessions. The speaker asserted that, while a scholar at these schools, he saw Warden Chamberlain present but once during five months. He then asked why the adverse opinion of the present warden should be received in preference to that of ex-Warden Haynes, who was in the school nearly every evening, and who had full confidence in the beneficial influence of evening instruction. The speaker denied also that the convicts were all given trades, stating that at the end of his five years' imprisonment he was wholly unable, on account of constant change, to show sufficient skill in any branch of mechanics to earn his livelihood. His next complaint was urged against the chaplain, who almost never visits the convicts in their cells, even when sent for. The men could have little confidence, he urged, in the Christian teachings of a man who never protested against the inhuman methods of punishment which still form a part of our prison discipline. The uncleanly habits the prisoners are obliged to form was also a subject of the speaker's reproof. He alleged that the prisoners were allowed to bathe only once in two weeks, to change their under clothing only once in two weeks in winter, and each week in summer, and this while engaged frequently in the dirtiest kind of work. Blankets were washed, he said, once a year, bed clothing changed once a fortnight, and the beds themselves were alive with vermin. While such filthiness is allowed, the prisoner asked how the moral sense of the men could be elevated, since cleanliness is akin to godliness. Mrs. Wetmore, and Mrs. Brooks, ladies who have for years been interested and active in the reform of convicts, were present, and gave their testimony in support of Mr. Burns' statement, and in opposition to the present system of prison discipline, particularly the methods of Warden Chamberlain. Mr. Augustus, another ex-convict, made a few remarks, all corroborative of the wrongs declared to exist by the speakers previously mentioned.—Boston Herald, April 5.

[The ladies above referred to did not corroborate every statement made by Mr. Burns, nor yet at all impugn his representation. So far as they had personal knowledge, they testified to his truthfulness and accuracy; but he said some things of which they had no personal knowledge at all. We add this note by request of one of the ladies.—ED.]

THE CORRECTORS CORRECTED.

"Free Discussion in Boston." Under this heading, an article appears in the last INDEX, signed by LaRoy Sunderland and John Hardy, to the effect that Mr. Sunderland originated or commenced the first free Sunday meeting ever held in Boston, which they say was in 1852. They make this statement in order to contradict "R. B.," who had said in THE INDEX (if we are not mistaken) that the free meetings began previous to that year.

"R. B." is right in this matter, and Messrs. Sunderland and Hardy are wrong. They don't mean to misrepresent—they forget, or perhaps never knew; and as the point involved is important, it had better be attended to now, and settled correctly. We remember Mr. Sunderland's free meeting in 1852, but that was not the first of the kind in this city. Twelve years before that time, or in 1840, a congregation of infidels and Christians, under the name of "The Free Discussion Society," commenced to assemble regularly every Sunday afternoon, in Winchester Hall, Purchase Street. Mr. A. B. Hutchinson, over whose store the hall was located, being a liberal-minded man, threw it open for free debates, and the meetings were there continued until transferred to other sections of the city. We do not remember of ever seeing Messrs. Sunderland and Hardy at the Winchester Hall discussions, and if our memory is not at fault they were both preachers about that time in some sort of a Christian church, or at least were not Liberals as at the present day. But "R. B." (a Liberal Christian) was there, active and zealous, and has so continued, in the cause of free discussion, from that day to this, he having enlisted in it for this life, if not for another.

It may be a question with the antiquarians (in coming time) as to where and when and who started the first free discussion in Boston? The correct answer, we think, is this: The meeting was begun in Winchester Hall, Purchase Street, in 1840, by infidels and such Liberal Christians as were friendly to free thought and free speech, and on this basis the novel and useful experiment has ever since been continued. The meetings are now held three times every Sunday at Hospitaller Hall, 593 Washington Street, and are well conducted, numerously attended, interesting, and instructive.

Our neighbor of THE INDEX will oblige us, and other friends, if he will please copy the above into his columns.—Boston Investigator, April 8.

THE EVILS OF INFLATION.

Fellow-Citizens,—We have assembled this evening, in Faneuil Hall, in the presence of the memorials of those who have been our leaders in peace and in war, to take counsel together upon the observance of the public faith. It is not for me to anticipate the result of your deliberations, but it does not require any prophet to declare that there will be no departure here from the principles which have hitherto guided Massachusetts and Boston upon this great subject.

The first legal tender act was passed by Congress on the 25th of February, 1862, and authorized the issue of $150,000,000.

Within one month of the passage of that act, on the 22d of March, 1862, the Legislature of Massachusetts passed a law declaring that "the interest and principal of all scrip or bonds of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which have been or may hereafter be issued, shall, when due, be paid in gold or silver coin;" and Massachusetts has redeemed and will continue to redeem this pledge.

On the 4th of April, 1862, the City Council of Boston passed an order "that the treasurer be and he is hereby authorized to pay the bonds of the city, and the interest thereon now due, or that may hereafter become due, in specie or its equivalent;" and Boston has redeemed and will continue to redeem this pledge.

Some new contracts, made payable in currency, have been so paid by the State and city.

After the great fire, in November, 1872, it having been suggested that the Secretary of the Treasury might issue an additional amount of currency in view of our calamity, it was unanimously resolved, at a public meeting of citizens in the Masonic Temple, that we "earnestly remonstrate against any such issue, as unwise, unnecessary, and prejudicial to the whole country;" and no such issue was made.

Massachusetts and Boston have taken their position, and it will be held.

On the 30th of June, 1864, Congress authorized a further issue of legal tender notes. The second section of the act contains this clause: "Nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan." The fifth section of the act authorizes the issue of $50,000,000 in fractional currency.

The act of Congress of April 12, 1866, provides "that of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and cancelled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month." Under this act, $44,000,000 were "retired and cancelled" in effect; and from that time $356,000,000 has continued and is, to-day, the limit provided by law for the legal tender notes.

On the 18th of March, 1869, Congress declared by law "that in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws, by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the sum may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. . . . And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith, to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

This was the first act of a general nature signed by President Grant, fourteen days after his inauguration, and, in the words of the present Secretary of the Treasury, "was an emphatic expression of the sentiment of the people, uttered by a new Congress then recently elected."

More than five years have elapsed since the public faith was thus solemnly pledged by an act of Congress, approved by President Grant. In order to form a correct judgment as to the performance of this pledge, we should in fairness consider the means at the disposal of the party who made it. The census of 1870, the year after the adoption of this law, gave, as the value of the real and personal estate of the country, more than $30,000,000,000, and the total issue of notes to be redeemed in coin was $350,000,000, less than one and a quarter of one per cent. of the amount of property on which it was charged. What merchant in any part of the civilized world could hold up his head in any community with liabilities amounting to one and one-quarter of one per cent. of his property, which liabilities he had solemnly pledged his faith should be redeemed in coin at the earliest practicable period, if, after the lapse of five years, they remained unpaid? The public legislation and the facts known to the whole country conclusively show that Congress has lamentably failed to uphold the public faith.

But this is not the only condemnation which lies at its door. It has recently been proposed, and a bill has passed the House of Representatives in Washington, to increase the legal tender issues to $400,000,000. By what authority is this to be done? How is it to be justified? At the time of the passage of the legal tender acts, it was generally conceded that they would not be sustained on any other ground than as war measures to preserve the government. By the proposed legislation, Congress would assume the power to enlarge the amount of currency at any time, and to any extent.

Upon a great question involving the public faith, no considerations of expediency should be allowed to intervene; but my convictions are clear and strong that there are no considerations of expediency, taken in a just and large view, which are in the slightest degree at variance with the plight of the public faith given in 1869.

It is claimed that the interest saved to the government by the circulation of its own notes is too valuable to be surrendered. Five per cent. interest on $356,000,000 is $17,800,000. The value of the annual products of agriculture, manufacturing, mining, and the fisheries is nearly $7,000,000,000, and the amount of wages annually paid in these branches of industry is nearly $12,000,000,000. If from the fluctuations of an irredeemable paper currency the loss to the country is only one quarter of one per cent., it is greater than the gain derived from the interest saved to the country by the circulation; and every laboring man and woman in the land knows that the advance in prices of everything which they use has been many times in excess of such fluctuation, for the use of such a currency.

If the industry of the country will lend its ear to its friends, and will give its own thoughts to a consideration of its interests, I have no fear that the present Congress will venture further in debasing the currency, and in violating the public faith; and if I am at fault in this opinion there can be no doubt that the Congress to be chosen in the coming autumn will answer with alacrity the appeal of the people.

A sound currency is the great demand of the labor of the people upon the government. They whose earnings are in the currency of the day or deposited in the savings banks of the land, whose loans are receivable in such currency, have the deepest interest in its fixed value. It is the great office of the government to place its stamp upon the coin which it issues, attesting its worth for commercial purposes, and it should never issue one dollar of paper money.

Many who now hear me can recall the suspension of specie payments in former days, and no such suspension has continued for any long time, when the currency was not issued by the government. The law and public opinion then compelled resumption at an early day. One year after the suspension in 1837, the best banks resumed, and full resumption took place in 1840. The suspension in 1857 lasted only three or four months. But so long as government paper is dishonored and unpaid, there can be no return to specie payments; and there is no power above the government to compel it to resume unless the people so resolve, and thus compel its action.

If a proper system of banks be established, with careful safeguards for the protection of the public, and just taxation be imposed for privileges conferred, the government using its power to enforce the provisions of law, we should have a currency as free and as abundant as the activity and capital of the country require.

We appeal to the President to uphold the public faith. Vicksburg is not and will not be forgotten, and he who led our troops to victory can protect us from defeat; and we confidently rely upon him to exercise his constitutional veto to preserve us from the threatened calamity of an unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money.

We appeal to the people of the country, who hold in their own hands in a large measure its future destiny. We appeal alike to the North and the South, to the East and the West, to keep inviolate the public faith. We will write upon our banners, never to be erased, "The public faith: it must and shall be preserved."—Speech of Hon. Wm. Gray at the Boston Mass Meeting, April 4.

A HERESY AND BLASPHEMY CASE.

We occasionally talk and write enthusiastically about this "enlightened nineteenth century," and half imagine in our conceit that all bigotry and superstition are gradually passing into the limbo of forgotten things. Here is a gentle reminder that religious intolerance has not wholly ceased in the world.

Rev. John Page Hopps, the Unitarian minister at Glasgow, is the author of a little book entitled The Life of Jesus, Rewritten for Young Disciples. It is said to be devout in thought, reverent in spirit, and pure in language, though as a Unitarian the writer naturally denies the divinity of the second person of the Trinity. It is not written in a sneering or scoffing spirit, but of course looks at the facts of Jesus' life from the Unitarian standpoint.

Now a certain Mr. Harry Alfred Long regarded this book as heretical, dangerous, and positively blasphemous. He accordingly reprinted it, with a general criticism of its faults and alarming tendencies, giving at the end of each chapter an attempted refutation of the doctrines advanced by Mr. Hopps. Naturally enough Mr. Hopps regraded this as an infringement of copyright, and the question has been up for legal decision.

The astounding plea is made by Mr. Long that The Life of Jesus, Rewritten for Young Disciples was blasphemous, heretical, and promulgating doctrines hostile to the law of the land. Consequently such a work could not be protected by copyright, and was the property of any critic who wished to expose its dangerous tendencies and—make a little money out of the piratical enterprise.

The agitation of this question has created a good deal of excitement in England and Scotland, and its decision has rightfully been regarded as having an important bearing upon the future of theological controversy.

The Sheriff-Substitute has at length come to the conclusion that "a reverent and sober statement of Unitarian doctrine" cannot be considered blasphemous. Though it is undoubtedly part of the common law that the second person of the Trinity is divine, yet "the public are entitled to criticize and controvert, if they please, the statute law of the land, provided they do so in such a way as not to endanger the public safety, morality, or peace." As the book does not violate these conditions, it is entitled to the protection of the law.

It thus seems established that Unitarians will hereafter be allowed to write books on theological subjects, even discussing the dangerous topic of the nature of Christ, without being in danger of having their works pirated and sold for the benefit of the first individual who happens to regard them as blasphemous and heretical. This is some slight gain; but what can be said of the average "enlightenment" of an age in which such things are possible?

We might appropriately add to our discussion of this comparatively harmless theological conflict a notice of the punishment which awaited one Richard Carlile, about fifty years ago, which we have just found in the current number of THE INDEX. This "incorrigible offender" had been guilty of publishing the work of such rampant blasphemers as Thomas Paine and Elihu Palmer. In a number of the Athenæum for 1820 is found this record:—

"In our last digest we had to mention the trials of Carlile for blasphemy, and his conviction. We have now the pleasure of recording his punishment; namely, for publishing the Age of Reason, an imprisonment of two years in Dorchester Jail, and a fine of one thousand pounds; for publishing Palmer's Principles of Nature, a further imprisonment of one year in the same jail, and a fine of five hundred pounds. At the expiration of his imprisonment, to enter into recognizances for his good behavior for life, himself in one thousand pounds, and two sureties in one hundred pounds each. Immediately after this sentence, a writ of levari facias was issued, under which all his property was seized, and his shop closed.

"With respect to the sentence pronounced upon this wretched man, we believe a culprit has never fallen under the penalties of the law from whose fate all sympathy is so utterly repelled. He has proved himself not only a daring, but an incorrigible, offender. He has betrayed no touch of shame or remorse during the whole of his profligate career. He took up blasphemy as a trade, and pursued the sordid traffic with a ravening appetite for gain which brands an odious quality of guilt upon his conduct."

Fifty years ago, doubtless, Mr. John Page Hopps would have fared as badly as poor Richard Carlile. We have grown a little wiser since then; but the instances of religious intolerance which are occasionally brought into public notice scarcely warrant us in supposing that the millennium is near at hand, or, as some hopeful people would have us imagine, that it is already here.—Liberal Christian.

MR. GARRISON'S LETTER

READ AT THE DEDICATION OF COSMIAN HALL, FLORENCE, MASS., MARCH 25, 1874.

BOSTON, March 22, 1874.

DEAR MR. CONNOR:—

I thank you for the invitation extended to me, in your letter, to attend the dedication of "Cosmian Hall," in Florence, the present week. Believing that the object of such dedication is, in spirit and purpose, directly in the interest of religious freedom and progress, on a broad and catholic platform, it would give me great pleasure to be present on the occasion; but that pleasure I am obliged to forego, in consequence of some local engagements.

It is many years since I saw the general emptiness of sectarian creeds and ceremonial observances, and was able to emancipate myself from all denominational trammels. As no body of men can be answerable for me at the bar of Eternal Rectitude, none shall control my liberty to think, speak, and act, on any matter touching the present or the future life. The idlest of all cries to me is that of "heresy," because all claim of human infallibility is profane egotism. Seeing that the heresy of one age is the recognized faith of the next, a new heresy is to be hailed as the germ of a fresh growth; or, at least, as something better than dead formalism or piety in "silver slippers." In the judgment of Rome, all Protestants are heretics; but how, on the Protestant ground of the sacred right of private judgment in all matters pertaining to religious faith and practice, there can be any Protestant heretics, because of differences of opinion, is what I do not understand. As a dogma, nothing is gained by substituting the authority of the Bible for that of the Pope; for what the Bible really teaches is to be settled by each reader for himself, and the result of this liberty is an endless variety of interpretations.

In order that Protestantism may stimulate to the boldest utterance and sturdiest non-conformity, whereby all possible mental and moral growth may be a resultance, there is yet a vast amount of Romanism to be eliminated from it. We are steadily making progress in this winnowing process; and I hail, as in the service of truth, every indication that the right of dissent is becoming more and more regarded as an inalienable right, and that dissent itself is not to be met with proscription or menace, but with courtesy and reason.

I am convinced that the readiest way to break the sorcery power of bigotry is a general coöperation in measures of radical reform and practical righteousness, having in view the happiness and welfare of the people; neither lingering in the past, nor concerning ourselves greatly about the distant future, but acting in "the living present," looking at its needs, nobly discharging its responsibilities, and conscientiously performing all the duties it imposes.

The various movements for the promotion of temperance, peace, moral reform, antislavery, impartial suffrage, popular education, scientific knowledge, etc., etc., have done much toward breaking down the old partition walls which for so long a period kept those who, but for them, "like kindred drops had mingled into one." In the presence of a great wrong to be redressed or an awful curse to be removed, all theological dogmatism becomes an impertinence, and every earnest worker in the field of reform will eschew it.

I have many pleasant and tender recollections of Florence in its early settlement, where were gathered together some of the best and freest spirits of the age.

Yours for going forward,

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

THE WOMEN'S CRUSADE.

The English press has shown a wonderful degree of interest in the women's temperance crusade, and the London journals continue to comment upon it. The Pall Mall Gazette, of March 5, has the following remarks in a long leader on the subject:—

"It is easy enough to look exclusively at the grotesque side of such proceedings, and there can be no sort of doubt that they are sufficiently ludicrous. There could hardly be a more absurd figure than that of the liquor-seller, who, having been fairly prayed out, thought that his best course would be to join the movement himself, and to take part in it vigorously, utilizing his past experiences of its evils in the cause of the praying women; but the movement has a very serious side indeed. It is a typical specimen of the sort of forces with which our women's rights agitators are playing. The two motives which always have worked, and which always will work, most strongly on women, are love and religion; between which, it is needless to say, there is a very intimate connection. The existing division of labor between the sexes puts these motives in the case of women in their proper places. The most affectionate and religious of women at the head of a household finds a proper sphere for her affections; and, on the other hand, finds a proper counterpoise to feeling in the arrangement of all the common daily affairs of life. Turn women into politicians, and they become at once violent and passionate; they see an evil, they determine to put it down without the least respect for the rights or property of others, and the course which they take is direct religious intimidation—an intimidation just as direct, just as distinctly coercive, as any which could be exercised by armed men, and much more objectionable, both because it is more difficult to resist, and because those who employ it have not been taught to regard it as wrong. A woman who would not for the world shoot a man, or burn his house over his head, or even threaten to do so, would think it a virtuous act in itself to go and stand in the rain and cold before his door, and, as she would say, expose herself to the scoffs of wordlings, and to the inclemency of the weather, till his hard heart was melted, or, in other words, till his business was driven away. Everything connected with religion—and especially religion in a more or less martyr-like, self-devoted form—is so very generally regarded as good in itself that numbers of women would take part in such proceedings as those described, without the least notion that they were doing a cruel wrong to the persons against whom their efforts were directed. It seems to us that to take away a man's property, or to destroy his trade by spiritual mobbing and intimidation, is just as bad as to produce the same effect by picketing or rattening, or even by threats of personal violence. If women are to be allowed to assemble together in crowds, for the purpose of praying whiskey-sellers out of their evil courses by besieging their shops, where are we to draw the line? Suppose they were to take it into their heads to mob a man for not going to church, or for going to what they regarded as the wrong church, what would be the difference? A harmless, inoffensive man, who had done nothing to injure any one otherwise than by setting what women of such a class might regard as a bad example, might on any Sunday morning, find a set of women collected in front of his house, determined to pray for him till he became cowed into due observance of his religious duties; and, if women ever took to such practises, we should be likely before long to see them supported by like-minded men. The machinery of missions would be brought to bear on a large scale on every class and every section of society, and hardly any act of our lives would be free from organized spiritual pressure of some form or other."

A TRUE STORY.

Two or three weeks ago an accident did not occur near Scranton, Penn.; the newspapers missed a sensational horror; and a dozen men, instead of being hurled into eternity without time to breathe a prayer, walked quietly home to their dinners, quite unconscious that death had had them by the throat. It might, after all, be worth our while to look into the cause of the loss of this tragedy to the world; we should have been keen enough to unearth the guilty party if it had occurred. The facts are briefly these:—

In the largest anthracite coal mine in the State, the care of the engine by which the cars for passengers are lowered and hoisted, is placed in the hands of a Scotch-Irishman, an ordinary fellow enough. The cable, necessarily of great weight and thickness, passes through the roof of a slightly-built shed under which he stands. One morning, as the man stood smoking his pipe, his hand upon the lever, his mind very probably busy with his dinner, and assuredly not wrought up to any heroic rapture of resolve, the ascending car (loaded with coal), at one end of the cable, broke, and fell crashing into the dark shaft, to be shattered into a thousand fragments. He knew that in the next minute the cable, released from the strain, would fly back and fall with crushing weight on the rickety beams and boards of the roof. Death was absolutely certain if he did not escape from the shed. But if he took his hand from the lever, the descending car, full of men, must fall one or two hundred feet. He had but one instant to face his death and theirs, and to choose between them. There was a boy in the back of the shed; the man motioned to him with his head to go out. Then he tightened his hold on the lever. The loosened cable struck and caught somewhere below against the side of the shaft. Surely God meant it should so strike! It was the delay of but a breath of time; but it was enough. The car grated with a jar against the ground far below; its occupants stepped leisurely out, while the man who had saved them above, threw himself from under the shed, just as its roof, beams, pulley, and all, crashed down on the spot where he had been standing.

We do not know the man's name, and should scarcely need to publish it if we did. Fame or reward jar somehow against the deed itself. There is a wholesome tonic for all of us in the certainty, which is forced upon us now and then, of the unknown, unmeasured resources of courage and heroism and unflinching integrity to duty which we possess among what we choose to call the mass of the people. It is, after all, only when a man reaches the certainties of middle age that he is not surprised every new day by the knowledge of how admirable a crew has been put into the world for its long voyage; how many of the women are gracious and finely natured; how many men respond promptly to the call of honesty, or duty, or even self-sacrifice, because it is the simple and natural thing for them to do so.

We will congratulate ourselves, then, not that his class can boast one such brave fellow as this Scotch-Irish engineer, but that, like King Harry over Percy's grave, we believe that it "has a thousand such as he."
—New York Semi-Weekly Tribune, April 7.

THE Echo is responsible for the statement that a distinguished London preacher, in a recent sermon, said that "there was not the least doubt that the earthly Paradise of Adam and Eve was filled to repletion with flowers, shrubs, and trees, formed of diamonds of the purest water, the combined lustre of which far exceeded that of the sun in his noonday splendor. At the Fall, these were scattered throughout in the shape of diamond débris. This débris was universal in the soil of all countries, and furnished the explanation of the diamond dust referred to as found in the Highlands."—London Graphic.

IT IS NOT what people eat, but what they digest, that makes them strong. It is not what they gain, but what they save, that makes them rich. It is not what they read, but what they remember, that makes them learned. It is not what they profess, but what they practise, that makes them righteous.

"GRIEFS OF THOUGHT."

BY MARION V. DUDLEY.

"Say, sweet-mouth, what is the shadow
That darkens your portals red?
And, wide-eyes, why has the wonder
From out of your beauty fled?

"What frightened the merry dimple
From the heart of a peach-bloom cheek,
And scattered the brown hair's lustre,
Like billows in careless freak?

"Come, banish the sadness of pity,
Shine out in your golden light!
Let Earth have the care of her poor ones,—
Play Sorrow is happy to-night."

" 'Tis not,"—and she said it slowly,
Her voice like the deep intone
Of waves when the storm-cloud lowers,
Ere its first black bolt is thrown,—

" 'Tis not for the ceasless moaning
Of sad ones that I am still,
For ever a ceaseless answer
They have from the great Good-will.

"My sadness to-night is not sadness,
But only a longing to know;
The haunting ghost of a query
Refuses to let me go.

"And if, in its eager speaking,
Irreverent seems my heart,
Then know that my restless thinking
Is too earnest for grace of art.

"I query why God the Father,
Who knew that the crested scale
Could charm from the Eden bowers
His daughter, so fair and frail,

"And ruin the sweet world's laughter,
And hush its young choral song,
And brand all the unborn ages
With stains of another's wrong,—

"I wonder why He, possessing
All power for love and right,
Held not from untaught innocence
The woe of a cruel blight.

"The world is so sad with sorrow,—
So dim with the dusk of tears!
How could an all-gracious Father
Let sin curse the white-souled years?

" 'Not question,' you say? 'Believe it'?
Ah friend, I am wrung with grief:
I pray, but no prayer relieveth
The spell of my unbelief.

"Blood stains the great hands Eternal!
'Twas blood that he made atone
For sin that his hand permitted,—
For crime in his knowledge done.

" 'A mystery'? Yes, so baffling
A mystery, and so deep,
That demons with glee must guard it,
While mortals in anguish weep.

"So long have I prayed for respite
From pressure of thoughts like these,—
So hard have I fought the foemen
Who mock at the golden keys,

"That open the pearly portals
Of heaven to him whose faith
Unwavering 'moves the mountains,'
And 'takes the sting from death,'—

"So long, that I fain would linger
To rest for a little while
On slopes of the upland sunshine,
In summer of Nature's smile.

"O sad is the weary progress
Of war that is never done,
And sad is the soldier's longing
For victory never won!

"I pine for the peaceful plashing
Of founts where the placid drink:
The dullest of low-browed mortals,
Who never was doomed to think,

"Has peace that surpasseth knowledge,
Believing with faith devout;
I am pricked with the goad of query,
And die from the pain of doubt."

GLIMPSES.

The "Congressional Petition" foots up 5,245 names; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 8,845.

All the "Petitions" not yet sent in should be forwarded as speedily as possible. It will soon be too late to make any use of them this year.

The Freewill Baptist paper, the Morning Star, argues in favor of exempting church property from taxation. But its arguments are adapted only for home consumption.

Signatures to the "Massachusetts Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From Charles Almy, New Bedford, 16; from Newton Littlefield, Haverhill, 9; from W. W. Curries, Haverhill, 11. Total for the week—36.

A select committee of the Rhode Island Legislature has the subject of church taxation under consideration. We are always greatly obliged by any information sent us respecting such movements,—particularly for newspaper extracts, with name of journal, date, etc., attached. It is not in all cases possible to print the extracts with which we are favored, but they are always thankfully received.

Signatures to the "Congressional Petition" have been received as follows since last week: From Peter Young, Buffalo, N.Y., 149; from George M. Wood, Secretary of the Liberal League, Washington, D.C., (by direction of the League) 145; from the Boston Investigator, 143; from Samuel R. Honey, Newport, R.I., 24; from Lucius Everett, Dover, N.H., 5; from William Walker, Dover, N.H., 28; from Carl H. Horsch, Dover, N.H., 37; from David A. Patterson, Sutter Creek, Cal., 56; from D. J. Rogers, St. Johns, Mich., 68. Total for the week—655.

Mr. A. Wallace, writing in the Contemporary Review, denies the obligation of the State to carry out the wishes of owners of property after they are dead. This position has force in it. What reason in equity is there for regarding wills as inviolably sacred? A man can transfer his property, while living, to whom he pleases, but has no power to control it afterwards. Why should he be permitted, when dead, to tie up forever, perhaps to most foolish uses, capital that ought to be left free for employment by his survivors? Especially is the mischievousness of this evident in the case of property bequeathed for purposes of propagandism. The State might justly refuse to be made the tool of such purposes under the disguise of perpetual trusts.

The Scottish papers recently announced that the Duke of Argyll, author of the Reign of Law, is about to convert five square miles, or over three thousand acres, of his estate in the South-west of Scotland into a deer forest. When swarms of poor people in Great Britain are annually driven to emigrate because they can scarcely find standing-room in the over-crowded island, such wantonness of luxury is a crime against man. If the despairing millions rise at last in rebellion against the selfishness of the great landed proprietors, and confiscate their estates as Henry VIII. confiscated the estates of the Romish Church, the lords who thus goad them into violence will have themselves alone to thank. No wise man disturbs the crater of a slumbering volcano.

In the Golden Age of April 4, Mr. Tilton has a temperate article on the late Congregational Council. He quotes from a recent "manifesto" by Plymouth Church the declaration that "Every man has an indefeasible right to separate himself from the church by his own sole act." If a man joins an association by simply signing its articles of agreement, without any vote by the association itself, he ought to have the right to retire by formally requesting the secretary to erase his name. But if mere absenteeism constitutes a termination of his membership, without even the formality of a respectful notice, what association could possibly exist? If Plymouth Church means to declare that it does not require this formal notice, it has succeeded in making itself supremely ridiculous. Probably the "sole act" of the individual member means such a notice.

Professor William C. Russel, of Cornell University, delivered an address to the Delta Upsilon Fraternity at Amherst College some time since upon "Education and Character," which has now been put into pamphlet form. It lets the reader into a little of the secret of the great power exercised by Professor Russel over young minds, though the magnetism of presence and manner cannot be printed. He considers the influences of "indirect" education acting through the contacts of daily life, the press, the pulpit, politics, and business, and then the influence of our common schools, academies, and colleges,—all with reference to the formation of large and rounded character. The imperfection of all our existing educational institutions is brought to notice with a force of exposition not to be evaded. There is great need of moral as well as purely intellectual training, in order to secure such education as shall be "the development of brain-power and of earnest character;" and the State, the people as a whole, should furnish it. The whole address is alive with the very earnestness it would kindle, and must be read to be appreciated.

Whether all women who are earnestly striving to secure woman suffrage ought to imitate Miss Abby Smith, and others, in the refusal to pay their taxes until they get it, is not a question that any man can settle for them. But we would suggest that a parallel instance may be found in the case of those men who are conscientiously opposed to the exemption of churches from taxation, and whose taxes are increased in this State about a dollar a year, on the average, in consequence of this exemption. If a separate tax-bill were presented for this dollar, at least some men would refuse to pay it, and take the consequences, on the ground that such a tax was in direct violation of well-recognized rights of conscience. But as this is not the case, the dollar being lumped in with other taxes justly due, the only sensible course seems to be to pay the whole under protest, and meanwhile agitate for a repeal of the exemption laws. Women ought not to forget that they actually receive part of the protection they are taxed for, and that to refuse payment of all their taxes is to put themselves partly in the wrong. This fact is confusedly discerned by the community, and would go far to neutralize the moral effect of such a refusal. We merely offer this suggestion as a respectful contribution towards a right solution of the question.

"The Christian Church," writes Theodore Tilton, "needs a Personal Liberty Law." This was wrung out of him by his hard experience of Congregationalism, as administered by the late Council. But he only sees half the truth yet, if he still believes that, with a personal liberty law, the Christian Church could survive. As well expect the "patriarchal institution" itself to survive the enactment of such a law! Christianity is the bondage of the intellect and conscience to certain sentiments which, beautiful and imperishable in themselves, become tyrants by usurpation of a supremacy that does not belong to them. Reverence, awe, aspiration, love, sorrow for wrong-doing, etc., enter as elements into every grand and noble nature. Yet let these and their kindred sentiments give the law to thought instead of taking the law from it, and you have superstition; and superstition never yet learned the meaning of the word freedom. The moment the mind is emancipated from all law save its own, the whole fabric of Christian doctrine melts into air, and the Church falls like a house of cards. It is not the Church that needs a personal liberty law, but humanity itself; and if Mr. Tilton learns the whole lesson of his conflict with the ecclesiastical spirit, he will see at last the irrefutable truth of The Index position respecting Christianity. The Church cannot tolerate perfect liberty, either of thought or action; and in proportion as it tries to do so, it undermines its own foundations. Whoever wrestles with this truth will be cast by it; the "golden age" will tarry, till the world accepts it and ceases to battle against the nature of things.

PRISON REFORM.

That society has a right to protect itself from aggression on the part of lawless individuals, no one can reasonably or seriously deny; and this right of self-protection includes the right to do whatever is really necessary to this end. On the unquestioned right of self-protection must rest all just control by the State over the life, liberty, or property of individuals. So far as such control is not absolutely required by the necessities of public peace and order, interference with individuals by the State is tyrannical; and so far as the general object can be attained without interference with them, just so far have they the right to be uninterfered with. Individual rights are not all abolished or destroyed, even by crimes against society itself; on the contrary, society assumes new duties to individuals when it shuts them up in prison, and thus deprives them of the power to do what otherwise they would be justly expected to do for themselves. Good food and shelter and clothes, for instance, which in freedom every one is expected to provide for himself, must be provided for all prisoners by the State, whenever it exercises the right of depriving them of their freedom. The State has no right to starve or torture them, or in any way to subject them to unnecessary suffering; no more pain must be inflicted than is absolutely essential to protect society from positive injury.

Now an enlightened view of what self-protection on the part of society requires does not stop with the mere imprisonment of criminals for a term of years; this of itself secures protection only during the continuance of the imprisonment. What will these criminals do, when released? Will they become good citizens henceforth, or will they continue their depredations on society? There is no possibility of evading this question; it must be met. Hence it is not only the right of society to imprison offenders for a season, but also to take all possible precautions against the repetition of their offences after discharge from prison. This is the just basis of all reformatory prison discipline. The State has no more right to meddle with the morals of prisoners than with those of law-abiding citizens, except on this ground of preventing future crimes. It is the self-evident interest of the community to provide in all possible ways for the re-absorption of criminals into itself as peaceful and well-behaved members. The fact of crime already committed justifies a presumption that crime will be committed again; and this presumption alone gives the State a right to subject prisoners to reformatory discipline. It is easier and cheaper to prevent crime than first to suffer and then to punish it; and the problem "how to prevent crime" is one of the gravest and most important that now press upon public attention.

Is it not a striking illustration of the "solidarity of man," of the complete unity and identity of all human interests, that in this matter of criminal reformation the interests of the State and of the criminal are so manifestly identical? It is the interest of the criminal to become a good citizen; it is equally the interest of the State that he should become one. Thus the State's effort to secure a genuine moral reformation of all criminals, which must rest simply on its own right to protect itself, and cannot be grounded on any general philanthropic desire, actually contemplates the same object which the purest philanthropy of society and the real self-interest of the criminal alike propose. The prevention of crime in the first instance by wise and careful education of all children, which is of course the best of all policies, is not now under consideration; crimes being once committed, the difficult task of accomplishing under all the disadvantages of prison surroundings what ought to have been done under easier conditions—namely, the training of unfortunate individuals to rational self-control—must be undertaken, and this is what we are now considering. The criminal has been put in prison simply to protect society for a time from renewed assaults upon its security; and, once there, he is now subjected to reformatory discipline simply to protect society from such assaults after he is discharged. It is self-protection first and last and all the time; but if the State wisely conducts this process of reformatory discipline, it will simply do what it ought to have done before—educate the criminal by natural methods to a noble self-government. Neglect by the State of the duty of universal education is the chief cause of crime; now, in prisons, it is expensively and laboriously striving to remedy the gigantic evils that have grown out of its own neglect. But this simple and luminously clear philosophy of prison discipline is not yet comprehended by all; and the greatest obstacle to its consistent and successful application lies in the persistent survival of Christian superstition in prison officials, in the government, and in the community itself. When General S. E. Chamberlain, Warden of the Massachusetts State Prison, declares: "Our discipline is founded on divine laws,—a system of rewards and punishments" [Annual Report, October, 1873: page 8], and goes on to pour out a deluge of similar theological drivel, showing how ignorant he is of the fundamental principle that self-protection, not punishment, lies at the bottom of all justifiable prison discipline, he completely justifies the conclusion expressed by Mr. Frank B. Sanborn in the Springfield Republican, in a fine review of this very report: "General Chamberlain's intentions are good, but we fear he has mistaken his sphere in becoming a prison-warden; as he certainly has over-estimated his own capacity to instruct the world in regard to prison discipline."

A little volume of one hundred and forty-three pages, written by Miss Mary Carpenter (so widely known both in England and America in connection with this whole subject), and published in 1872 in London, gives a most instructive and absorbingly interesting account of the Irish Convict Prison system, as developed by Sir Walter Crofton. This system, though in some important respects adapted only to a small country like Great Britain, and not to a vast one like the United States, in which the division into separate political communities or States must prevent the possibility of establishing a "ticket-of-leave" system, an efficient "police supervision," etc., stands at the head of all existing prison systems in the enlightened principles and methods by which it undertakes the task of "transforming offenders into honest, self-supporting men and women," and thereby "minimizing crime in society." The practical success of this system has been simply wonderful, though the theoretical justification of it is not fully or satisfactorily set forth by Miss Carpenter. There are three grades of imprisonment in Ireland; the first being separate imprisonment in a "cellular prison" at Mountjoy, Dublin, for the first eight or nine months of the sentence,—the second being imprisonment in an "associated prison" at Spike Island or Philipstown,—and the third being imprisonment in an "intermediate prison" at Lusk Common, within fifteen miles of Dublin. The convict is transferred from one grade to another, according to the fitness he manifests, by a system of marks which enable him by industry and self-control to shorten greatly the term of his sentence. The higher he goes up in this scale, the larger liberty he wins, and the more confidence is placed in him; hope and honorable ambition are stimulated, a hearty coöperation is secured between prisoners and officials, and every incentive is held out for an orderly and honest life. By developing self-respect and self-control, and by providing beforehand for a fair start after discharge in some regular employment, the convict is made to see that his own best interests are carefully studied and promoted by the very State that has imprisoned him in self-defence; antagonism and revenge die out, the future becomes bright to his anticipation, and reformation is in a very large per cent. of the cases actually secured through simple fidelity to the laws of human nature. This system was first tried about twenty years ago, and is still in most successful operation.

We wish that every person in the land might study this admirable little book, to the end that an intelligent public opinion, formed with due regard to the differences between Ireland and America, might necessitate the adoption of a better system of prison discipline than now prevails. Our own special interest in the subject has been very recently awakened by learning of abuses totally unsuspected by the public in the administration of at least one State Prison. Not wishing to be unjust to any one, we postpone further comments now; but we shall undoubtedly recur again to the subject, when more fully informed. If Free Religion means anything, it means the betterment of mankind; and the vast questions, how to prevent crime, and how to treat criminals, are among the most momentous to be answered. On these questions we have something to say; and nothing seems more directly in line with the general purpose of THE INDEX than to say it here.

LAW AND LOVE.

I have no doubt that, at some stage or other in our career, we shall be able to reconcile the elements that now seem hard to reconcile—law and love; scientific security on the one side, and faith in some personal guidance (using personal for want of a better word) on the other. It is plain that science is impossible, unless we assume the permanence of natural laws. On the other hand, there is so much more happiness in life, for almost all temperaments, in the belief in some personal relation to the Unseen—the absence of this seems to leave such a missing element in the noblest lives, as that of Stuart Mill—that most persons cling to it. For lives of sorrow and disappointment it seems almost essential.

"Ay, sooth we feel such strength in weal, thy power may be withstood,
But what are we in agony? Dumb, if we cry not God."

I do not mean that this emotion is at all necessary to the moral heroism and self-devotion of a life. The contrary is evident. But for the full happiness and sweetness and loveliness of a life, through severe trial, it seems essential. Science gives truthfulness and patience and equable endurance, and those may sometimes be worth more, for practical purposes, than the heights of religious emotion, where these are matched by corresponding depths. But if they are not so counterbalanced, then the table-land attained by such emotion is higher, it seems to me, than anything which science, as such, can give. Such a type of sweet security as those lines of George Wither's describe:—

"I should not care how low my fortunes were,
Might still my hopes be such as now they are
Of help divine; nor fear how poor I be,
If thoughts yet present still may bide in me,—
For they have left assurance of such aid
That I am of no danger now afraid."

I do not think we are called upon to surrender such emotions as this, at the demand of science. For one, I do not propose to surrender them. Sometime they may be reconciled with science. "We are too young, by some years yet, to form a creed." Half knowledge may often show us more than greater knowledge; as night shows us myriad suns, and day but one. When I look up at the starry skies, and feel crushed with a sense of my own ignorance and remoteness from the knowledge of those wondrous worlds, it is not so very hard to waive some questions, and to leave them to be settled when we are wiser. Let us not fear anything that science can teach us, nor forget how little its utmost range can give, compared to the unknown.

One thing we can all observe. The wiser a parent is, the more thoroughly are love and law identified in his administration, till his providence so completely covers every fact of his child's life that his law never needs to be changed, yet adapts itself to all contingencies, so that the child finds literally no distinction between law and love. The parental care is absolutely unvarying, yet absolutely tender; the highest tenderness and highest wisdom coincide; there is no need of variableness, neither the shadow of turning. The parent knows what the child needs to ask for, and what he will ask for, better than the child himself knows. The guidance is not recognized by the child; he thinks himself free, and is free; but his freedom is exercised within the embrace of a larger wisdom, and his prayers are granted without violation of law, because the law foresaw and included them. This is the tendency of every wise parental government: to become, literally and actually, an earthly providence to the child. If now a human parent can attain to this, or at least tend toward it, cannot the Power that maintains the universe in existence do thus much, and more? T. W. H.

THE WOMAN QUESTION AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

Some facts are stated in the book called Hampton and its Students which are interesting in their bearing on the woman suffrage question.

It says: "The proportion of girls to boys in the applicants for admission to the school is about two to three;" and, "as a general rule the young women are not so intensely alive as the young men are to the importance of an education."

Ask any young freedman what liberty means to him, and he will answer instantly, "Citizenship suffrage—the right to be an American citizen." Ask a young woman, and what could be the answer? Perhaps, not to be torn from her mother, not to be insulted by her master, not to be publicly whipped or sold. All negative values; but what great positive encouragement is open to her? It is well known that the negroes thoroughly believe in the old English law, and are fond of beating their wives; and many freedwomen refused to be legally married after their emancipation because they thus became legally enslaved to their husbands.

The writer goes on to say: "A higher stand-point than slavery has left her is necessary to see that freedom's rich gift to woman is better than the ballot-box, and imposes higher responsibility: the gift of home, the right to her husband, the right to her children, the right to labor for her loved ones in a secure home, whose purity and happiness depend more than half upon herself. She does not dream that there is as much connection between arithmetic and housekeeping as there is between grammar and public speaking." No, she does not see it, because she has not the control even of her children or her home. She has the right to labor, as most slaves have; but she has not the control of the results of her labor, and she does not see that education is to bring her honor or profit. Women, no less than men, are social as well as domestic beings, and ask for a wider recognition and more extended usefulness than the narrow circle of home offers; and it is in vain to think that they will eagerly seek after knowledge, if they have no opportunities to make use of it.

AN ORTHODOX PUZZLE.

The following letter, mail-marked at Boston, March 12, was not meant, perhaps, for publication, but the writer (or writers) certainly cannot object if it be set to do a larger missionary work than with the one individual to whom it was addressed. The only way, too, in which I can give my new friend (or friends) the due consideration of an answer is through the press, since the letter does not name the present abode of "Paul and Cephas." One of my first impressions was that "Paul and Cephas" only furnished a disguise for some sarcastic radical; but on reflection I decide that it is a genuine and Orthodox epistle. Whether, however, the puzzle it presents will not perplex Orthodox believers more than rationalists, may be a question.

The second objection made is evidently the stronghold of "Paul and Cephas," and to that only will I call attention. The argument here presented has often occurred to my own mind,—though with a somewhat different application. I have long been accustomed to think that it is the old theological theory of a special revelation—the theory that Orthodox Christendom contends for—that is responsible for such modern religious demonstrations as Mormonism, Shakerism, Millerism, the Oneida Community. These all rest on the claim of a special divine communication made to certain individuals, and to be accepted as authoritative, however much it may transcend or violate the dictates of reason and experience; and this is the same claim which Orthodoxy makes for the authority of the Bible. "Paul and Cephas" think these modern claims are "fanaticism;" but what is to decide between these claims and the claims which they make for the revelation in the Bible? Is there any other test except the general reason and experience of mankind, for distinguishing truth from error in the so-called "revelations" that are claimed to have been made? And to set forth this test, by the doctrine that "revelation takes place through the rational human consciousness," was the object of the discourse to which "Paul and Cephas" objected.

Alas! it is true, their "revelation assures many Mormons that polygamy is right," and there are men who do "claim concubinage as right" by revelation; but how will "Paul and Cephas" manage "from the Bible" to rout these claimants who bring up the example of Solomon and other worthies with their multitude of wives? The New Testament teaches, indeed, a better "standard of morals," but what tells us it is better? Surely, not any supports that are alleged for its miraculous authority,—for the old Testament, the Orthodox claim, also had these. It must be admitted that "many contradictory theories are beguiling unsteady souls;" how many different and antagonistic interpretations, for instance, of the one infallible revelation in the Bible are put forth even by Orthodox Christians! How are we to know, among so many, which is the right interpretation of "the revelations of God"? Can "Paul and Cephas" tell us? W. J. P.

REV. WM. J. POTTER:

Dear Sir,—I have just read one of your discourses, entitled "Reason and Revelation;" and I respectfully beg to present you with some objections to your conclusion.

First, Christ was the finisher of the Christian faith; you cannot, therefore, add to it.

My second objection is this, and perhaps, as we understand matters, the strongest one:—

People may believe they have a revelation from God when they have none. All fanaticism is founded on such belief,—Mormonism, Swedenborgianism, Millerism, and so forth. Therefore the Christian world needs a standard. So do all systems of belief; and they must be tried within defined limits. Suppose that men should claim concubinage as right, would it be so? Must not we have some standard of morals? And if man has a revelation to suit himself, may he not have as many wives as he can support? What is to prevent this? Revelation assures many Mormons that polygamy is right. Who is to decide the question?—the majority of people, or some man who has a revelation and reason to prove that he is right?

You see the danger of allowing every one to claim his own revelation; this was the case with William Miller, the deluded second-advent man, and also with many dupes. They all claimed reason and revelation, especially the book of Daniel, for their support.

Is there any way under heaven given to men whereby they can be saved, than the name and teachings of Jesus, the Christ, the only begotten son of God? On no other foundation than Jesus laid can any man build.

Why, look at the Spiritualists; see how many contradictory theories are beguiling unsteady souls, and playing the very devil in the world.

Satan assumes the livery of heaven, and deceives the very elect.

Aside from the Bible, how are we to know the revelations of God? Your friends,

PAUL AND CEPHAS.

LECTURE NOTICE.

Bishop Ferrette is to give a short course of three lectures at the New England Woman's Club Rooms, on Wednesday afternoons, beginning April 15.

We hope these lectures will be fully attended. They will be of a popular and entertaining character, and yet will impart much valuable information in regard to those interesting people who inhabit the ancient lands of the East.

The bishop has great power of lively narrative, and is sure to make his journey "from Bagdad to Damascus" full of interest to his hearers. He has much to say, too, about The Arabian Nights, of which we have in English only a garbled version. Bishop Ferrette's great learning and marvellous facility in the acquisition of languages enabled him to enter very fully into the thoughts and life of the people of the East, and his wide sympathies led him to look at their religion and customs without bigotry or prejudice.

We hope, too, our friends will avail themselves of his rare power as a teacher of languages; or rather, I might say, of language, for he goes deep down to the real meaning of all languages. We can speak from personal experience of him as a teacher in French. He bases the peculiarities of French pronunciation and idiom on law, and traces every deviation from the original type back to its source. He is equally interesting as a teacher in Greek, and would like to form classes in the language of the Koran.

THE SACRED ANTHOLOGY. A Book of Ethnical Scriptures. Collected and Edited by Moncure D. Conway. London: Trübner & Co. 1874.

[The following passages, selected by W. C. G. from the Sacred Anthology, were crowded out of last week's paper. They will be found to be of great interest.—ED.]

(167.) Nánác lay on the ground, absorbed in devotion, with his feet towards Mecca. A Moslem priest, seeing him, cried, "Base infidel! how dar'st thou turn thy feet towards the house of Allah?" Nánác answered, "And thou,—turn them, if thou can'st, towards any spot where the awful house of God is not!" (Persian.)

(151.) The East and the West are God's, therefore whichever way ye turn, there is the face of God. (Koran.)

(412.) The roads leading to God are more in number than the breathings of created beings. (Persian.)

(120.) Ride thou on for eternity through the heaven, mounted on thy ideal, thou shalt not stride beyond his threshold! Soar thou beyond all limit to the roof of the universe, thou shalt behold one tile of his dwelling,—one tile, no more. (Persian.)

(142.) The Most Just raised me aloft, and I beheld the place of bodies like a drop in the ocean of souls; and I saw the place of souls like a drop in the place of intelligences, and the place of intelligences like a drop in the ocean of the Divine Essence. (Persian.)

(162.) Stand or walk or ride, lie down or rise from sleep,
Go with thy friend to a corner and whisper him secrets to keep,—
And Varuna, the Lord of the Worlds, knows all!
He is there as the third!
The firmaments two, of ocean and sky, are the loins of the King,
But the King,—he sitteth on his throne in the dewdrop's tiny ring.
Who flies from Váruna beyond the stars straight to Varuna flies,
And he knoweth and counteth, one by one, the twinklings of our eyes!
(Hindu. See Max Müller's Chips, I., 41,—versified.)

(122.) Which is the great name of God? Tell me his least name, and I will return to thee his greatest. (Persian.)

(411.) Clear have we made our signs for men of insight. God causeth the grain and the date-stone to put forth, he causeth the dawn to appear, he hath ordained the stars. God is not ashamed to set forth the parable of a gnat as well as any nobler thing. The believers will know it to be the truth from their Lord. (Koran.)

(102.) Thou art smaller than the smallest, and greater than the greatest. Seeming many, thou art one. O Universal Pervader! Where need of thee is, there art thou! (Hindu.)

(108.) Within my heart God's golden feet
I place, that I with God may meet.
If he be mine, what can I need?
Then everywhere to God does lead.
Within, beyond man's highest name,
My God existeth still the same;
In sacred books, in darkest night,
In the blue deeps of heavenly light,
In those with whom the truth has birth,
And in his faithful few on earth.
(Hindu versified.)

(113.) Heaven and earth take refuge with thee as a child with its mother. I celebrate the thought of the beneficent Father and the sovereign Mother, from whom all creatures have proceeded, an offspring sharing their immortality. (Hindu.)

(258.) The knowledge which men call certainty I deem the faintest dawn of thought. My heart is pearl, ocean, diver. I am myself hell, purgatory, and paradise. These verses bear witness to a free thinker who belongs to a thousand sects. (Persian.)

(369.) "O prophet," said one, "my mother is dead; what is the best alms I can give away for her soul?" Mahomet bethought him of the panting heats of the desert, and said, "Dig a well for her, and give water to the thirsty." The man dug a well and said, "This is for my mother." (Mohammedan.)

(375.) Those destitute of love appropriate all they have to themselves; those who possess love consider even their bones to belong to others. (Hindu.)

(353.) Never will I seek nor receive private, individual salvation,—never enter into final peace alone; but forever and everywhere will I live and strive for the universal redemption of every creature throughout all worlds. Until all are delivered, never will I leave the world of sin, sorrow, and struggle, but will remain where I am. (Chinese Buddhist.)

(212.) Know this well, O King, that whatever ceremonies prescribed in the Vedas bring needless pain or death contain no virtue and conduct to no beatitude. A Veda void of mercy is a Holy Scripture only in name. O King, not even a god could possess virtue did he not also possess mercy. And he alone is the true worshipper of God—be he Brahmin or Pariah—who cherishes all beings with generosity and compassion. (Hindu.)

(125.) The man who considers all beings as existing even in the Supreme Spirit, and the Supreme Spirit as pervading all beings, henceforth views no creature with contempt. (Hindu.)

(444.) He who reproaches the pariah is baser than he. Of what caste is He who speaks in the pariah! (Hindu.)

(737.) Justice is so dear to the heart of Nature that, if in the last day one atom of injustice were found, the universe would shrivel like a snake-skin to cast it off forever. (Hindu.)

(329.) Whoso would carelessly tread one worm that crawls on earth, that heartless one is darkly alienate from God; but he that, living, embraceth all things with his love, to dwell with him God bursts all bounds above, below. (Persian.)

(52.) Nánác says: "He alone is a true Hindu whose heart is just; and he alone a true Mussulman whose life is true." (Persian.)

(56.) A man does not become a Brahmana by his platted hair, by his family, or by both; in whom there is truth and righteousness, he is the true Brahmana. (Buddhist.)

(216.) He who has controlled his own spirit and desires gathers the fruit of a pilgrimage. The virtuous man's home is his desert of devotion. Thyself art the sacred river; its waters, truth; its banks, right conduct; its waves, benevolence. Here wash thy lips, for the interior soul is not purified by holy water! If truth be placed in a balance with a thousand sacrifices of horses, truth will outweigh a thousand sacrifices. (Hindu.)

(412.) The world is a man, and man is a world. (Persian.)

(170.) May that soul of mine, which contains all Sacred Scriptures and texts, as spokes held in the axle of the chariot-wheel, and into which the essence of all created forms is interwoven, be united by devout meditation with the Spirit supremely blest and supremely intelligent! (Hindu.)

(554.) The principles of great men illuminate the universe. (Chinese.)

(355.) This great, rich earth, with all its generations of men, is vigilant that sorrow shall not come upon kind hearts. (Hindu.)

(528.) Do thou only not withdraw thy neck from the yoke of God, and nothing shall be able to withdraw its neck from thy yoke. (Persian.)

(734.) A Durwaish in his prayer said: "O God, show pity towards the wicked; for on the good thou hast already bestowed mercy by having created them virtuous." (Persian.)

(323.) When a man dies, mortals will ask, "What property has he left behind him?" but angels will inquire, "What good deeds hast thou sent before thee?" (Mohammedan.)

(637.) In Paradise there met the soul of the departed one a beautiful maiden, whose form and face were charming to heart and soul. To her he said, "Who art thou, than whom none so fair was ever seen by me in the land of the living?" The maiden replied, "O youth, I am thy actions."

(728.) In a region of bleak cold wandered a soul which had departed from the earth; and there stood before him a hideous woman, profligate and deformed. "Who art thou?" he cried. "Who art thou, than whom no demon could be more foul and horrible?" To him she answered, "I am thy own actions." (Parsee.)

(709.) Not in the sky, not in the midst of the sea, not if we enter into the clefts of the mountains, is there known a spot in the whole world where a man might be freed from an evil deed. (Buddhist.)

(730.) I saw in hell one whose body a noxious creature gnawed, but his right foot was not gnawed. The angel said to me, "This is the soul of a lazy man, who when living never did any good work; but with that right foot which suffers not, a bundle of grass was cast before a ploughing ox." (Parsee.)

(720.) On the day when all shall give an account of their deeds, not a grain shall be taken of that which thou hast reaped, but a harvest shall be demanded of that which thou hast not sown. (Persian.)

(634.) Your savior is your deeds, and God himself. (Parsee.)

NEW RESEARCHES ON ANCIENT HISTORY: Embracing an Examination of the History of the Jews until the Captivity of Babylon; and showing the Origin of the Mosaic Legends concerning the Creation, the Fall of Man, Flood, and Confusion of Languages. By C. F. Volney, Count and Peer of France, author of The Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires, etc. Boston: published by J. P. Mendum, at the office of the Boston Investigator. 1874.

No better idea can be given of this book, with its long title, than to quote entire the "recapitulation" of its contents at the close, which is as follows:—

"Now, if we recapitulate the results just obtained, we conceive we have established the truth of the following propositions:—

"First, that the book called Genesis is essentially distinct from the four others that follow it.

"Secondly, that the analysis of its several parts proves it to be, not a national book of the Jews, but a Chaldean monument, revised and arranged by the high-priest Hilkiah, so as to produce a premeditated effect, political as well as religious.

"Thirdly, that the pretended genealogy, mentioned in the tenth chapter, is in reality but a nomenclature of the nations, known to the Hebrews at that time, and that it forms a geographical system in the style, and according to the genius of, the Orientalists.

"Fourthly, that the pretended antediluvian and post-diluvian chronology, so improbable, and even so absurd, is not, until the time of Moses, anything more than an allegorical fiction of ancient astrologers, whose enigmatical language, like that of the modern alchemists, first led into error the superstitious vulgar, and afterwards, in process of time, the learned themselves, who had lost the key of the enigmas and secret doctrine.

"Fifthly, the true chronology did not and could not commence before the true history of the Jewish tribe; that is, the period when their legislator Moses united them into one national body.

"Sixthly, that nevertheless, even at this period, no regular calculation can be discerned in the Hebrew books; that it is not until the pontificate of Eli, twelve centuries before our era, that one begins to find a continued chain of dates and facts, meriting the name of Annals.

"Seventhly, finally, that these Annals were drawn up with such negligence, and transcribed with such inaccuracy, that all the art of criticism is requisite to reëstablish them in some satisfactory order.

"From all these propositions, it follows evidently that the books of the Jewish people have no right to regulate the annals of other nations, or to be our sole guides in remote antiquity; that their only merit is to furnish means of information, subject to the same inconveniences, liable to the same rules of criticism as those of other nations; that their system has been hitherto wrongfully made the regulator of all others; and that it is in consequence of this erroneous principle that writers have fallen into inextricable difficulties, by striving at one time to make ancient events descend to later dates, at other times by lengthening out more recent events to remoter periods. This kind of confusion, which is particularly observable in the history of the empires of Nineveh and Babylon, is with us a motive for examining it anew, and offering additional proofs of the excellence of our method."

This work is recommended to those who are willing to examine the Jewish Scriptures, as to their claims to authenticity, with the same impartiality that they would any other writings, and who do not fear any results to which evidence may commit them.

NO SUCH WORD.—The late Mr. Choate was one day taking up his papers at the conclusion of a long hearing before a referee, when the latter, referring to a particular branch of the case, said: "It seems to me, Mr. Choate, that there are some hiati in the evidence upon this point." "Oh, no, Brother So-and-So," replied the advocate, "that is impossible; it cannot be so in the very nature of things, for hiatus is of the fourth declension."

THE DEVIL has been badly worsted by Rev. J. B. Sylvester of Chatham Centre, N. Y., who writes to the Christian Advocate as follows: "A few weeks ago, the devil got up a ball (or dance) on my charge. I announced that we would have seven prayer-meetings for each ball. The movement resulted in fourteen prayer-meetings, at which the church was greatly quickened."

THE NAME.

I have read with interest the expression of views in THE INDEX, by different persons, respecting the name which religious people should wear. I do not accord with any of them entirely, for the reason, as it appears to me, that they all fail to dig down to "hard pan." Let us try, if we can, in a small compass, to arrive at "the true idea."

What is man? The highest expression of the Infinite known to us. Out of man (this manifestation, on this planet, of the Infinite himself) have grown all systems of religion and government which have existed, or now exist, among men. These are valuable, just as they have attained, and practically taught, eternal and universal truth. Just as this has been learned and taught has man advanced in his grand progress as a child of the Infinite, and become a man, until the idea culminates in the various conceptions of "the grand man." Now a dog may properly wear a collar inscribed with the name of his owner. But can men properly do so? Are not all sectarian names, virtually and truly, servile badges? Hence are they not one and all terribly repressive and dwarfing to the wearers of them? Must we not have been in bondage, ever to consent to wear them? Can we be freemen, standing in "the freedom of the truth," if we voluntarily and intelligently continue to wear them? Even the Free Religious Association seems to me short of the mark. It seems rather to me, if you will pardon the presumption of the comparison, like the manly yearning of the oppressed, striking for "the land of freedom," dimly in sight, but not yet attained. The right of an individual to dispense with collars is not acknowledged by any sect that I know. The right to be men in the fullest and purest sense cannot be gainsaid, and is not in terms denied by any. As there is much in a name that truly expresses a correct and grand idea, permit me to suggest, for the consideration of the lovers of truth and freedom, one which I learned years since to revere, on account of its grand significance and universality. In the traditions of the West, there exists a legend of a race of men who occupied the soil long before the advent of the pale-face. The grand developments of Nature had a corresponding effect on man. They took, in harmony with their surroundings, the proud title of "Illini," which means, The Men. This seems, to my apprehension, a name unobjectionable, grand, and universal. It is a name that all the lovers of truth and freedom can, without a tinge of shame, inscribe on their banners, and under it march on, until the "unity of truth," and the "brotherhood of man," are proudly and intelligently acknowledged over the earth. E. H. B.

[Would our correspondent have advised the Free Religious Association to dub itself "The Men" at the start? Or how can it now modify its name so as to merit his unqualified approval? We confess a little curiosity to learn the answer to these queries.—ED.]

PROPERTY RIGHTS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I am glad that the columns of your good paper are open to all wise reforms, and am, as you are already aware, especially interested in the discussion of property rights.

Wishing to "be true" to my principle, and "not flinch from its logical consequences," I would ask, in reply to Mr. Abbot's arguments of January 26 and March 5 (that the only way to establish the husbandman's "right to the whole crop" is to abandon the cost principle, and vindicate it by conceding "the righfulness of taking interest"), whether, admitting that the crop "is the product of Nature's energy," it follows that the husbandman, in accepting it, receives his "value increased by the energy of the users"?

If, as Mr. Abbot argues, a claim to it as "the wages of Nature, given him for guiding and protecting her energy," is not valid, for the reason that he has "conferred on Nature no benefit," and made her "no better off," and "rendered to her no equivalent whatever;" then, as the "invested capital" was no more beneficial to her than the labor, which Mr. Abbot says was of no benefit, the logical consequence of Mr. Abbot's argument is the destruction of his own vindication.

As proof that the whole crop in excess of the seed is the wages of Nature, given for guidance and protection afforded her energies, let the doubter invest seed without any labor, and learn whether or not Nature will "concede the rightfulness of taking interest."

When Mr. Abbot says, "A quantity of corn equal to what he planted, plus a quantity of corn exactly equal to the value of his time and labor, is all that the cost principle will allow to be justly his,"—does he not admit all that we claim for the farmer?

His error consists in making a false comparison between the labor and the corn.

The criterion of the real cost of labor may be discussed in the future. Meantime, will Mr. Abbot give us a criterion of the true rate of interest, or increase, that Nature and man should comply with?

Since Mr. Abbot defends usury, and justifies the taking of "value increased by the energy of the usurers," let him apply his principle to Nature, in her dealings with men, and inform us how and when his principle is observed; and how much interest, or increase, Nature may rightfully require at their hands. Who will say that Nature does not get an "equivalent" for all her investments in mankind? Or that mankind do not get an "equivalent" for their investments in Nature? Would Nature create mankind at a loss? Or do men receive either more or less from Nature than they give up to her?

We agree with Mr. Abbot that the cost principle "rests on another principle back of itself," but we do not accept his definition of it, namely: "The right of labor to its own products is the only valid property-right," in the sense in which Mr. Abbot uses it; for he makes no provision for exchange with Nature, where man's labor simply guides or protects.

Natural law limits all property to those qualities and conditions of things produced either by human energy or by that of animals or Nature, while guided or protected by it. To "be true" to this principle we hold that cost should be the limit of price in order to protect the inviolable rights of property.

Remove all unjust restrictions from, and protect the inalienable rights of, each individual, and the advantages of preserving property by a scientific and just exchange will soon induce even selfishness, when enlightened, to sell at cost, or less.

Respectfully, WM. L. HEBERLING.

BATH, Ill., April 2, 1874.

[How either "selfishness" or unselfishness can long afford to "sell at cost, or less," it passes our ability to comprehend. It is certainly as unjust to take less, as to charge more, than cost. But as we find the different advocates of the cost principle taking positions which are mutually contradictory, we shall refrain from further comment till we consider the statement of this principle by Mr. Warren, its promulgator.—ED.]

LICENSE TAX ON SECTARIAN PROPERTY.

BY BISHOP FERRETTE.

The advocates of Church Property Taxation have done their task so admirably that I have nothing to add to their arguments.

Assuming, then, as demonstrated by others, the proposition that CHURCH PROPERTY SHOULD CEASE TO BE EXEMPT FROM TAXATION, it is my present object to introduce the further proposition that ALL SECTARIAN PROPERTY, BESIDE BEING TAXED AS OTHER PROPERTY, SHOULD PAY A SPECIAL LICENSE-TAX.

By sectarian property I do not mean church property, as such, alone. Sectarian property includes not only the church property of sects, but also that of their schools, hospitals, and other institutions, the enjoyment of the temporal advantages of which is submitted to a sectarian condition. On the other hand, church property is not necessarily sectarian, for the Church, considered in its essence, is not sectarian but human. I can easily conceive a church simply catholic in the human sense, and having nothing sectarian at all. The Unitarian Church might, perhaps, lay claim to be that church; and it is on the ground of its having that character that most of its members, so far as I am aware, adhere to it. Unitarians call themselves Christians; but Christianity, in their eyes, is not a sectarian belief. It is a special assertion of the great universal human truth, which did not originate in Jesus. Jesus professed it because it was true.

It is not, however, the position of the Unitarian Church that I am now discussing, but the necessity of imposing a License Tax on Sectarian Property. If the Unitarian Church is a sect, it should, according to my proposition, pay the license tax as any other sect, without any favor.

By a license tax I mean not such license as is imposed on merchants and some professional men for mere fiscal purposes; but such license as is imposed by the State on some special kinds of property, such as whiskey and distilleries, for the moral purpose of checking the development of social evils promoted by them.

In admitting that such establishments, where they exist, should be kept in check by being submitted to a specially heavy license tax, I do not wish to be understood as taking side in the quarrel which now divides the State of Massachusetts as to whether those industries should be allowed to exist at all. If they do not exist, they cannot be taxed. If they cannot be made to cease to exist, no one will deny that they should be kept in check by special taxation. Likewise I do not assert that deeds of trust for the application of property to sectarian purposes should be recognized as valid by the law. I think, on the contrary, that, while the deed itself might be held valid, the sectarian condition should be cancelled, because IT IS IMMORAL TO MAKE THE PROFESSION OF A SECTARIAN OPINION A CONDITION FOR THE RECEIVING OF MONEY. All religious conditions, such as of changing or not changing one's religion, are reputed immoral by the French law, and in all such cases the property passes to the beneficiary whether he performs the condition or not. The law of this country should certainly be modified in this sense, and will no doubt be at no very distant period.

But assuming the law to be what it is, and the tenure of property on sectarian conditions to be recognized as valid, the law should make an unfavorable discrimination with regard to property held on those conditions, just as it does in the case of distilleries and whiskey-shops where they are allowed to exist: on the ground that all these things tend to deteriorate public morals. Sectarian trust-deeds tend to prolong the life of creeds so absurd that neither the people who profess them, nor the ministers who preach them, nor the trustees who pay the ministers on condition of preaching them, can believe them. The hypocrisy thus maintained among certain classes of religious leaders is the germ of bank defalcations and election frauds and legislative bribes, just as whiskey-saloons and gambling-houses lead to prostitution, theft, and murder. Clergymen of all denominations should welcome the passage of a law which would invalidate the sectarian condition in all deeds under which their emoluments, places of worship, or the ecclesiastical property of their respective denominations are held. Such a law would be to them what Lincoln's Proclamation of Emancipation was to the negroes: it would elevate them to a new sense of their dignity as men. But until that millennium, that year of the deliverance of the Lord, comes, there should be a tax on religious slavery just as there is one on whiskey and on tobacco.

"PROPERTY" AND "POSSESSION."

BOSTON, March 30, 1874.

MR EDITOR:—

In a communication in a late number of THE INDEX, Mr. Heywood claims that "man has not the right of ownership in land and other natural resources;" that he has only rightful ownership of the fruits of his own labor. To own materials, he says, "is naturally impossible." What Mr. Heywood means by wishing to abolish land-ownership, etc., I cannot understand, for he afterwards goes on to say: "Undoubtedly the fact that one has expended labor on materials establishes the right to the possession of those materials against all who have invested no service in them."

In order to get a better understanding allow me to suppose a case:—

Two men, A and B, with an equal expenditure of labor, build each a house. After both buildings are completed, B discovers that, owing to the superior quality of the clay from which A's bricks are made, A's house is so much superior to his, in beauty, durability, and comfort, that he would gladly exchange buildings, even though he had to give a bonus from his other possessions as an equivalent for its superiority.

Under these circumstances I would like to ask Mr. Heywood—

1st. Has A the right to accept this bonus from B?

2d. If so, is not this selling what his labor did not create?

3d. If otherwise, then by what right does A hold and enjoy these natural advantages which are as much B's as his? In other words, what right has man to possess property, if he has not the right to dispose of it?

4th. Are not the right of possession, and the power to dispose of that right, all that is meant by the term "ownership"? Respectfully yours,

R. H. RANNEY.

"SCIENTIFIC ETHICS."

MR. ABBOT:—

I have just finished reading your lecture on "Scientific Ethics," published in THE INDEX of March 12, and can assure you that one of your readers did not "pass it over as even more dry than long." It impresses me with its comprehensive and grand ideas, disappointing me only in its brevity. Though the analysis to which you subject moral science goes far beyond the "thus far" of my religious education, I cannot discover any danger accruing from so candid and rational conclusions as yours. Certainly no one can esteem moral science less, or find any justification for delinquency in duty, from reading such a respectful, sincere, and profound treatise of the subject as yours. Under the tyranny of a hereditary religious intolerance that attempts to fetter the spirit and mind of progress with the narrow conceptions of the past, such thoughts come to the earnest seekers of truth like the hope of deliverance to the long immured captive.

THE INDEX discusses in an unequivocal manner the very subjects that I have been interested in for several years, and is doubtless satisfying the requirements of this thinking age more than any other paper that claims to be an index of religious thought.

It appears to me that the enlightened world is discarding the superstition and bigotry of past ecclesiasticism, and beginning to comprehend true religion in its sublime, catholic, and ennobling nature.

This golden science, for which so many base counterfeits have been imposed on ignorant credulity, is now pointing aspiring humanity to larger attainments and more perfect relations than the churches of the past have conceived of.

Yours truly, H. CLAY NEVILLE.

PLEASANT MOUNT, Mo.

CERTAINLY a large proportion and the best of the pleasantries in the Drawer come from and are about the clergy. Here is one of the Rev. Mr. ——, who had taken into his service, for general utility, a poor lad, and for whose spiritual welfare he was, of course, bound to look out. Desiring one morning to put in practice his benevolent intent, he called the boy to his study, and with visage of the gravest sort, said:—

"Sam, do you know you are a sinner?"

"Yes," falteringly replied Sam.

"Do you know what will become of you, if you do not repent?"

Receiving no coherent reply, he launched into repentance and redemption, encouraged by the evident impression made by his words, and feeling no small compunction the while that he had so long neglected a "subject of grace" so promising. At last a vacant and wandering look roused a sudden suspicion, to verify which he inquired:—

"Sam, what is a sinner?"

Imagine the situation when the "subject of grace" promptly responded:—

"Sinner, sir? Yes, sir; sinners is strings in turkeys' legs, sir."

The sinews of the parson's face relaxed.—Harper's Weekly.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

ERNEST RENAN is working on the last pages of the manuscript of his Origin of Christianity.

IT IS NOT what others think, but what I think, that is of most importance to me. Nor is it what others feel obliged to do, but what my conscience dictates, that is of greatest concern to me individually.

THE Jewish Times, in noticing the latest new volume of sermons by O. B. Frothingham, says: "The weapon which Mr. Frothingham uses in demolishing the structure of misconception, misbelief, irrationalism, and unnaturalism, is of the finest, sharpest material; his logic is polished and bright, and so fascinating as almost to make attack attractive."

THE Shaker and Shakeress, for May, contains this notice: "Shakers Wanted. One hundred thousand Shakers wanted soon as convenient. None need apply who cannot sha e, or learn to shake, themselves free from all prejudice, all wrong, all sin—all evil of every name and nature."

CORNELL UNIVERSITY has another "feather in its cap." A Lectureship of Hebrew History and Literature has been founded in it by an eminent Israelitish banker of New York; and Dr. Felix Adler, an accomplished scholar, has been selected as Lecturer. This is another happy advance against sectarianism.

IT IS VERY generous in Rev. Mr. Murray, of the Park Street Church, to offer to serve his society without any salary, until such time as they can afford to pay both him and an associate pastor. This shows that Mr. Murray is not a mercenary man, and should be set down not only in his favor but in that of ministers as a class.

NO MAN can live by himself wholly; and yet we may live too much in society. A good degree of privacy is essential to the finest life. Too much society makes us mere imitators, apes; too much individualism makes us selfish and conceited. Between the centrifugal and the centripetal motion of our being we must preserve a nice and even balance.

"JUDGE NOT that ye be not judged." How difficult it is to obey this precept! Even he who was wise enough to utter it was not always consistent enough to be true to it. We ought ever to discriminate between opinions and persons, between even practices and persons; and while we condemn, if we must, what is expressed in word and deed, we should strive to do justice to motive, aim, and spirit.

"WHAT IS LIFE worth without action?" said Mr. Sumner, on one occasion. As truly may it be said, What is life worth without repose? He who is always doing, always acting, always forth-putting, without due pausing, due resting, due self-containment, becomes inevitably a sensationalist, a fanatic, a dogmatist, a nuisance, and a bore. Fortunately, Mr. Sumner was as grand in repose as in action, in rest as in motion.

"I NEVER regarded my function as negative, except in a small degree," said Theodore Parker. "I would pull up the weeds, and give them to the pigs; then plant the corn for men and pigs too." Yes, even pigs like corn as well as men, and will eat it, too, in preference to weeds when they can get it. Sower of truth! sow broadcast your seed, on "high" and "low," on "wise" and "ignorant"! The "way-side" sometimes may yield you better return than the furrowed field.

IT APPEARS, from the minority report of the Liquor-Law Joint Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, that Massachusetts has more liquor-shops open than any other New England State in proportion to her population, and that she pays the Federal government thirty per cent. more for taxes on liquor than all the other New England States together. And yet Massachusetts has a Prohibitory Liquor Law on her statute book; notwithstanding which, the Committee say, intemperance has fearfully increased in this State!

THE EDITOR of the Investigator thus states his position: "For our part, we accept truth—the pearl of great price—wherever we find it; whether in Jesus, Socrates, Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, Voltaire, Abner Kneeland, or Theodore Parker; and whatever any one of them teaches that seems to us wrong we reject, 'hit or miss.' Thus believing what we regard as true, and disbelieving only what appears to us to be error, we think our belief is good, and our unbelief good also." This is square, fair, and sensible.

M. D. CONWAY has been visiting M. Renan, and this is the picture he draws of the distinguished Frenchman:—

He is a man of about fifty, thick set, but not tall, with a full face and a strong brow. His eye is at once sweet and penetrating, and his voice both gentle and firm. He gives one the impression of a man who has a great deal of work in him, and one likely to give the orthodox far more trouble than he has even yet done. With his smooth-shaven face and black academic dress he conveys still the impression of the priest until he converses, when he is felt to be more than all a scholar. He divides his labors between his theological writings and the Asiatic Society, of which he is Secretary, and which, indeed, rests mainly on his shoulders.

A POET, in a moment of deep vision, has written the following line:—

"And beauty breathes throughout the land."

But is it true? We believe it is. And yet how few of us have the fine poetic sight to see it! Patches and blots of ugliness meet our eye in many places; and of beauty, in such cases, we can see none. Still, these are but masks, now put on, now put off; behind them is beauty—"Beauty old but ever new!" It is the highest reach of the artistic-religious mind ever to perceive this universal breathing beauty through any and all disguises.

JOSIAH WARREN died in Charlestown, Massachusetts, Tuesday, April 14. His death, at last, was somewhat sudden, as his condition previously had taken a more hopeful turn, and it even was thought that he might be restored to a comfortable state of health again. But such hope proved fallacious, and when he once more began to fail he sank rapidly to his death. His funeral took place, in this city, on Friday of last week; the services being conducted by Rev. W. R. Alger. It is expected that some fitting biographical notice of Mr. Warren will be prepared by his friend Mr. Morse, and be published hereafter in THE INDEX. Meanwhile, there will be found in another place in this paper a report of some remarks made at the funeral of Mr. Warren, by one taking part in the services.

THE NEW YORK East Methodist Conference, in a recent session, voted overwhelmingly not to print hereafter in their Minutes the memoirs of ministers' wives. If they had voted against printing any memoirs of anybody, it would have been well enough; but to make a discrimination between ministers and their wives, in this matter, seems to us unfair and unchivalrous. We have known, in the course of our life, a good many Methodist ministers and their wives, and we feel "under deep conviction" that our testimony ought to be given in on the woman's side in this question. We have observed that, besides often being "the making" of their husbands, the piety, humility, patience, devotion, and usefulness of the wives has been fully equal to that of their lords. If there are to be any memoirs printed, therefore, we should vote that the wives should have their share of the honors as well as the labors.

The Philosophy of the Labor Movement.

AN ESSAY READ AT A MEETING IN THE ROOMS OF THE NEW ENGLAND WOMAN'S CLUB, APRIL 8, BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

The battle of Despotism versus Liberty is at least as old as the hills, and it would sometimes seem as eternal. From general political chaos to the divine right of kings was a great step; from the divine right of kings to the divine right of majorities was a greater step; from the divine right of majorities to the divine right of the individual will be the greatest step of all, and presupposes more than one revolution. "I feel that I cannot go wrong when I lean to the side of liberty," was the sublime utterance of the noblest soul Massachusetts ever sent to Washington. Spite of all seeming retrograde movements, mankind are ever gravitating toward justice. Taken at their best, they are seeking freedom in dead earnest. This is the meaning of the reforms, each one of which, so far as it is guided by thought, is a protest against some form of the "barbarism of slavery," and a demand that liberty shall be not only national, but world-wide and universal. Of course all aristocracies, whether of color, intelligence, wealth, or sex, are antagonistic to this idea, and are being, or are to be, overturned. The labor revolution grows naturally out of a condition of things which produces and maintains an aristocracy of wealth.

"The State," said Emerson once, "must consider the poor man, and all voices must speak for him." That is one of the duties of this hour. In every period of history there is some great fact which stares us in the face, demanding attention and ultimately removal. With us, for thirty years, that fact was chattel slavery; to-day it is poverty. The struggle for the abolition of the second is a natural outgrowth of that which resulted in the abolition of the first. They are as like as father and child, the son possessing all the traits of the sire. Poverty is full of the elements of slavery, extreme wealth of slave-holding. Just as the abolition of slavery carried with it the slave-owner, so the abolition of poverty will carry with it the labor-owner. Justice required that the black man should own himself; it requires that labor shall own itself. Goldsmith wrote wiser than he knew when he said:—

> "Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, > Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Perhaps he had some slight vision of the time when men should say to their sons, in the old lines of Ben Jonson:—

> "Get money; still get money, boy;
> No matter by what means."

It is not hard to see the results of such teaching on every hand. From the man of business who, in the lust for the almighty dollar, gives up all home life, and bolts down his meals in restaurants, to the poor outcast who has no home to eat her meals in, the corrupting influence of a state of society in which (to borrow an expressive phrase) men are "choked with cotton dust and cankered with gold," is painfully apparent.

Perhaps your next-door neighbor is a millionnaire. His elegant mansion is filled with the finest furniture, pictures adorn its walls, and books in abundance lend their inexpressible charm. This man is a large operator in stocks. He has been what is called a lucky fellow, and without working very hard has accumulated a fortune. From his windows he can look out upon a half dozen dilapidated buildings, in which sunlight is unknown, on whose floors are no carpets, on whose walls and tables neither pictures nor books. Filthy, ignorant, half-starved human beings,—that is all they contain. The mansion of wealth and the hovels of poverty side by side,—these are the products of the highest civilization the nineteenth century can boast. As the poor men and women who rent those miserable abodes pass and repass that stately mansion, going forth from home at daybreak only to return with the setting sun, think you their aspirations for a full development of all their faculties are large? Do they grasp forward for great ideas, for justice, love, mercy? Neither do the pampered family inside those stately halls. Alike in their lack of appreciation of the great realities, an impassable gulf separates them forever, save when they go hand in hand to vote iniquity at the polls. Take it where you will, if you can imagine society divided into three sections—the rich, the middle class, and the poor—you will at once see that the greatest amount of real happiness is to be found in the middle class. In that is the most sobriety, the best education, the largest progress; while, if you seek the strongholds of vice and crime, the abodes of intemperance and prostitution, you go straight to the doors of extreme wealth and poverty. Now if the good things of life are in excess in the middle class, and the bad things preponderate in the other two, it follows that the middle class comes the nearest to the ideal state: in other words, that the abolition of extreme wealth on the one hand and poverty on the other would bring no nearer to a just commonwealth. Directly bearing on this point, Stuart Mill, in his Autobiography, referring to a change in his own views from the time when he thought only of mitigating the inequalities of existence, says: "The notion that it was possible to go further than this in removing the injustice—for injustice it is, whether admitting of a complete remedy or not—involved in the fact that some are born to riches and the vast majority to poverty, I then reckoned chimerical, and only hoped that by universal education, leading to voluntary restraint on population, the portion of the poor might be made more tolerable. . . . I now look forward to a time when society will no longer be divided into the idle and the industrious; when the rule that they who do not work shall not eat will be applied not to paupers only, but impartially to all; when the division of the produce of labor, instead of depending, as in so great a degree it now does, on the accident of birth, will be made by concert on an acknowledged principle of justice; and when it will no longer either be, or be thought to be, impossible for human beings to exert themselves strenuously in procuring benefits which are not to be exclusively their own, but to be shared with the society they belong to. The social problem of the future I now consider to be how to unite the greatest individual liberty of action with a common ownership in the raw material of the globe, and an equal participation of all in the benefits of combined labor."

Do such views seem visionary to-day? And if so, why? Because to-day the desire for money overrides everything else. Live intemperance, live prostitution, live all manner of wickedness, so you help the powerful to coin dollars and power out of the miseries of the weak!

"Master," said the fisherman, "I marvel how the fishes live in the sea?"

"Why, as men do a-land," was the reply; "the great ones eat up the little ones."

Exactly so; and the labor movement proposes to reform that fact, so far as the men are concerned, by so changing the existing order of things regarding wealth and poverty that there shall be no great ones to eat, and no little ones to be eaten. It recognizes at the start, in the language of its best thinker, that the greatest evil of modern times is poverty; and the abolition of it will be the most important knowledge which can be communicated to mankind. It knows well that poverty is the dead weight on many men's shoulders, keeping them down, and thereby retarding the progress of society. Whatever people do about this demand of labor, one thing is certain:—

> "This mournful truth is everywhere confessed:
> Slow rises worth by poverty depressed."

Nor must the intimate relation between poverty and extreme wealth be forgotten. The two live or die together. Not more certain is it that the large majority of laboring men receive too little than that the few who constitute in the main the employing class receive too much. The excess in the one case is the result of the deficit in the other. Hence rational labor reform means that the power of accumulated wealth shall be destroyed, and its natural counterpart, poverty, abolished; or in other words it calls for a more equitable distribution of wealth. There is something very forcible in the eloquent and touching little speech which Dickens put into the mouth of Stephen Blackpool, who, his employer said, always had a grievance.

"Look round toun," he said, "so rich as't is—and see the numbers o' people as has been broughten into bein heer, fur to weave, an to card, an to piece out a livin twixt their cradles and their graves. Look how we live, an wheer we live, an in what numbers, and by what chances, an wi what sameness; and look how the mills is awlus agoin, an how they never works us no nigher to ony disant object—ceptin awlus, Death. Look how you considers of us, an writes of us, an how yo are awlus right, and how we are awlus wrong, an never had no reason in us, sin ever we were born. . . . Sir, I canna, in my little learning an my common way, tell what will better aw this, but I can tell yo what I know will never do't. The strong hand will never do't. Agreeing fur to make one side unnat'rally awlus and forever right, and t'other side unnat'rally awlus and forever wrong, will never do't. Most o' aw, ratin 'em as so mooch power, an reglatin 'em as if they was figures in a soom, or machines, wi out loves an likens, wi out memories and inclinations, wi out souls to weary an souls to hope,—this will never do't, sir, till God's work is onmade."

And Stephen might have added, Only one thing will do it, and that is justice. And justice means that in some way or other this man who owns States and controls Legislatures, and this poor woman who, driven by poverty, goes down to hell in North Street, shall be brought under the reign of civilization, and enjoy the benefits of the golden rule. It means the curbing of unjust power, and the lifting up of the ignorant and passionate. It means education, opportunities, aspiration, fair play. In a word and primarily, it means a more equitable distribution of wealth.

Now how shall this distribution be accomplished? Men say, "Suppose you get wealth equally divided, it will all work back again to its present condition. The same causes which have made things as they are will make them so again." Ah, yes; but we propose to change the causes. True, if Stewart and Vanderbilt are to sit down once a month, or once a year, and distribute their dividends to the less favored, they will have to continue the operation regularly. But that would be the most artificial arrangement in the world, and is an idea promulgated not by the friends but the opponents of labor reform. Labor cares nothing for A. T. Stewart; it cares everything for the system of which he is the fruit. It knows well that he gives of his possessions liberally,—that he establishes lodging-houses for workingwomen, and all that; but it does not like the system which makes it possible for him thus to give, and necessary for the workingwoman thus to receive, his charity. Be it clearly understood, therefore, we have nothing to do with the past, everything to do with the future accumulations of wealth. See the difference. If we operate on that already garnered, we deal inevitably with men, and make mere surface work of it. It is like cropping off the twigs and branches; the roots and trunk are left, and the tree still grows. If, on the contrary, we look to the future, we shall work not upon men but underlying causes and principles, and change them. Or perhaps, more correctly speaking, we shall remove the artificial impediments which man has set up to stop the peaceful operation of natural laws. The great thing is not to abolish Stewart, but so to alter the existing order that such as he shall be impossible in the future. Dig up the roots, and the twigs and branches will take care of themselves. When any one asks, therefore, "What does the labor movement mean?" the answer is plain. It means a more equitable distribution of the proceeds of labor, the abolition, through natural causes, of extreme wealth on the one hand and poverty on the other. And this brings us direct to the question, Under what sort of a system can the relations of capital and labor be based on equity? The answer is contained in one word, CO-OPERATION. Not the combining of one class against another. Not protective unions formed for the saving of a per cent. Circumstances may justify and excuse the one, and prudence and economy lie at the bottom of the other; but both are superficial. The real coöperation is a combining of principles, a protective union of the two vital forces. As Mr. Phillips has expressed it, Capital and Labor are naturally like the two parts of a pair of scissors. They shall be partners, every laborer being a capitalist and every capitalist a laborer.

Herbert Spencer says "that, while the humanity of the remote future will have but one religion, as primitive humanity had but one, we are now living midway in the course of civilization, and have two, which are opposed to each other—the religion of enmity and the religion of amity. The two religions are adapted to two conflicting sets of social requirements. The one set is supreme at the beginning; the other set will be supreme at the end; and a compromise has to be maintained between them during the progress from beginning to end. On the one hand, there must be social self-preservation in face of external enemies. On the other hand, there must be coöperation among fellow-citizens, which can exist only in proportion as fair dealing of man with man creates mutual trust. Unless the one necessity is met, the society disappears by extinction, or by absorption into some conquering society. Unless the other necessity is met, there cannot be that division of labor, exchange of services, consequent industrial progress and increase of numbers, by which a society is made strong enough to survive."

Evidently, such a harmonious relation is not to be reached in a day, a month, or a year. It is to come naturally and in order. So that although we may talk of coöperation as an end to be sought, it is only as something in the future; it is not, in this broad and radical sense, possible to-day. Before we can consider what the condition of labor will be, when it gets its share of the world's wealth, we must consider its condition here and now. Before we can answer the question, How shall wealth be more equally distributed? we must first answer the question, How is wealth distributed as equally as it is?

This brings us face to face with the wage-system. For our present purposes, it is sufficiently accurate to say that the wealth of the world is distributed through four channels—Profits, Charities, Theft, and Wages; and that by far the larger portion of it is distributed through wages. At all events, what the laborer gets comes through that channel. Now the wage-system is world-wide, and may be safely taken as the gauge of civilization. That is, to use the language of the Report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, the day's pay of the Chinaman is an index of his idol worship, his patriarchal government, and exclusive policy. The day's pay of the American indicates freedom and a republican or coöperative government. The wage-system is the natural step from barbarism and slavery to coöperation. The passage through it must be a natural growth. The race did not jump from barbarism to wages; it cannot jump from wages to coöperation. It ever moves by the slow but sure process of natural laws.

First, then, having accepted the fact that so much of the wealth of the world as labor secures comes to it through the wage-channel, we proceed to answer the question, How shall the transition be made from wages to coöperation? by saying that it must be by causing the laborer to receive gradually more and more of wealth in the shape of wages. Or, more exactly speaking, wages must be increased without increasing to a corresponding extent the cost of production. Men must be made dear faster than things. Plainly, if labor could receive to-morrow fifty per cent. more of the proceeds of its toil in wages than it receives to-day, without having the cost of production so much increased that it would cost it fifty per cent. more barely to live,—that is, if the purchasing power of its wages could be increased,—it would be an advance toward that coöperation which means a more equitable distribution, and is so well illustrated by the scissors. So we come to ask ourselves, What is the law which governs wages? Why have they been steadily increasing for hundreds of years? What will continue the increase in years to come? We answer, The expense of living; or, in plainer phrase, perhaps, the habits of the people. There is no power like habit, especially where education is lacking. The beast does things from habit, and, the more animal man is, the more does he act from the same impulse. Now you cannot teach the mass of men to hoard money. Here and there an individual may, but the majority will spend very nearly what they receive; and, by a law as strong as any in the universe, they will receive, as a whole, about the amount they spend. That is, their wages and expenditures will be regulated by their habits of living.

Mr. James Hole, in his Homes for the Working Classes, writes:—

"That wages are very much regulated by the habits and standard of living of the workman is one of the best established principles in political economy. Inferior habits of living are as much a cause as they are a result of low wages."

John Stuart Mill says (Political Economy, vol. 1, p. 455):—

"No remedies for low wages have the smallest chance of being efficacious which do not operate on and through the minds and habits of the people."

Hon. Amasa Walker says (Science of Wealth, p. 255):—

"There being, then, no uniform and established standard of wages, they vary according to the expenses of subsistence in different countries, and the condition in which the laboring classes are willing to live."

However these authorities may disagree on other points, they seem to agree on this: that wages represent very nearly the expense of living. Hence the capitalist, looking from his narrow standpoint, says that the ignorant man, the degraded, brute man, is the cheapest laborer. So he is, but he is also the poorest consumer. And he is a cheap laborer because a poor consumer. Increase his wants, and the new slippers, the extra coat, the most superficial of improvements, will tend to raise his whole standard of living. Thus, elevating his habits, you will increase his wages, and, while increasing his wages, will increase his consumption. Making him a dearer laborer, you also make him a better consumer. Making him a better consumer increases by so much the demand for production, and increasing the demand for production naturally makes the manufacture of merchandise cheap. So that while improving the habits of the people will on the one hand increase wages, on the other it will increase the amount of production, and hence diminish rather than increase its cost. Or, in other words, whatever will increase the wants and comforts of a people will increase wages, without increasing to a corresponding extent the cost of production. If it be urged that wages may be increased without increasing the cost of production, and still the capitalist receive as large or a larger proportion of the profits than now, because of the increase in the amount of production,—that is, that the capitalist may receive a smaller percentage of the profits, and still, by the introduction of machinery and the action of the generally recognized law that it does not cost ten times as much to make ten coats as it does to make one, secure the same lion's share of the proceeds of labor which he now enjoys, and therefore a more equitable distribution of wealth be as far off as ever,—we reply that, the more the habits of the people are improved, the better will they be able to obtain wealth, and use it wisely. The process of education in its broadest sense, which shall take A. B., who lives in that dilapidated ten-foot building at the North End, without carpets, curtains, or tablecloths, surrounded by filth and corruption of every description, and put him into a neat cottage, with plenty of sunlight, furniture, papers, and books,—which shall give his wife a flower garden, and his children a healthy atmosphere,—that process inevitably educates into him more of the ability to secure his share of the wealth of the world. To suppose this to have been done with the thousands of A. B.'s, who "delve from early morn 'til late at eve" for a mere pittance, is to suppose a gigantic stride taken towards coöperation and the more equitable distribution which it signifies.

The objection brought to most of the schemes advanced in behalf of labor is that they fail to recognize the importance of education. The objection is a sound one, and usually well-founded. The twin evil of poverty is ignorance, and education, broad and universal, an absolute necessity. It is the glory and the strength of this theory concerning wages that it is based on that very proposition. It is the educational phase of the movement. Its fundamental idea is that the masses must be educated up to better habits of living. No wise man looks upon education as a mere matter of school books. Education means the freest and broadest development of all the faculties. With the mass of men, ground down by poverty, the first step in that development is to better their habits of living.

See that man with ragged clothes and filthy face, his hair uncombed, just enough of his boots left to hold them together. As he walks your streets, he looks ready to go to pieces all at once, like the deacon's "one-horse shay." Put some new shoes on his feet—he begins to see the need of new trousers to go with them; then a new vest, a new coat, and a clean face. Then he goes home; his wife and children need new clothes, too, he thinks. Then his house must be repaired; there must be a carpet on the floor, a table in the room, and by-and-by, when months, perhaps years, of such reform have gone on, he will come home some night with the Herald or Times. Then his taste for reading will begin. He won't read Charles Sumner's speeches at first; more likely the doings of the Police Court. But he will have begun the habit of reading. So we might follow him through a long life of such gradual improvement. Well, that is education, broad and substantial; the natural, logical way to abolish ignorance and its attendant evils, such as intemperance and prostitution. It is precisely the education which forms the grand base of this whole theory of increasing wages by raising to a higher level the habits of the people, creating in them new wants, enabling them to secure new comforts. Am I not right, then, in claiming this as the educational phase of the labor movement, and in summoning to its support the men and women whose minds are broad enough to see, and whose hearts are warm enough to feel, that this is the education which the world needs? Had I ten thousand tongues, each one gifted with the eloquence of O'Connell, they should all say, "Improve the habits of the masses, that they may be dearer laborers and better consumers; that thus, by naturally increasing wages and production, a more equitable distribution of wealth may be attained."

This, then, is the touchstone to which all measures proposed on behalf of labor must be brought. Every means by which the habits of the masses can be improved, their wants increased, their style of living raised to a higher level, and thus wages naturally increased without a corresponding increase in the profits of capital,—every such means is to be accepted. Of all the measures proposed, the two which most fully and clearly come under this head are the ballot for woman and a reduction of the hours of labor. Let us briefly consider each of these. Take the ballot for woman. If a careful observer of men and things were asked what is the most scandalous fact of the century, he would be forced to reply, The condition of the workingwoman. She is doubly enslaved. She suffers first, as all women do and as workingmen do not, from the old and barbarous idea, not yet outgrown, of the inferiority of the female sex, and its consequent subordination to the male; and, second, she suffers as all workingmen do, and as other women do not, from the old and equally barbarous idea of the degrading influences of labor, and the consequent subordination of the laboring to the capitalist class. She is not only a woman, but a laboring woman. She is not only a laborer, but a woman laborer. She is the subject of two aristocracies; one of sex, the other of wealth. She must be emancipated from both. The heavy oppression which cuts her off from her share of the world's opportunities, and refuses to open to her all the avocations of life, will not be overcome until both the labor and the woman's rights movements conquer. The triumph of the former will simply place her in the category with other women. The success of the latter will only put her on the same platform with the workingmen. The friends of woman, therefore, may well insist that she shall have time and room in which to grow, and the friends of labor will be false to her highest interests if they do not insist upon her having the ballot, that with it she may demand her own rights, and speak on all public questions for herself. The ballot means for her the opening of a career; the opening of a career means a change in all her habits of living; and a change in all her habits of living means a larger share of the proceeds of her labor. I recall with no small degree of satisfaction the admirable words of the Report of the Bureau of Statistics for 1871:—

"The workingwoman (in common with all other women) should be at once endowed with her rightful political equality. This will do more towards purifying the social state, and correcting the evils under which she suffers, than volumes of statutes. The vilest man can further his villainy at the ballotbox; the purest and noblest woman cannot protect her smallest right thereby. The tyranny that oppresses her is strengthened by her own disfranchisement, and makes her impotent to defend her own prerogatives."

The ballot, then, is an instrument in the hands of the workingwoman for securing a more equitable distribution of wealth, through the wage-channel. It is the columbiad of which Mr. Sumner speaks, that shall make her a full-armed monitor.

Again: take the measure of a reduction of the hours of labor. Not necessarily ten hours or eight hours (by-and-by it may be six or four), but a reduction of the hours of labor. That means more leisure for the working classes,—room in which to grow,—time for the making of men. This demand raises man above all consideration of manufactures or commerce, and calls for the largest development of humanity. In other words, it says, Secure through wages that better distribution of wealth which shall lead to coöperation, by improving the habits of the people; by that broad education which means the fullest possible development of all the faculties. Now to claim that a man is open to such an education who has time only to work, eat, and sleep, who leaves home at daylight only to return at night utterly exhausted, is simply an absurdity. To quote from a recent writer, himself a mechanic, the present system of long hours means, so far as labor is concerned, "to get up in the morning at five o'clock, cook and eat a hasty breakfast, run perchance to catch the cars, go off into a corner to eat a cold dinner from a basket, and to reach home at seven in the evening, used up bodily and mentally. What opportunity is there here for recreation and culture? There is a great deal said about parental influence. The influence of a father who goes to his work before his little children are up, and returns to his home to find them sound asleep, is certainly mild in its nature."

Such is the testimony of a man speaking from practical experience. Can we not all of us endorse what he says? Do we not know that to improve even an hour, from eight to nine in the evening, in reading and culture, we must come to it with unwearied limbs and a fresh, active brain? How can you expect a man who labors at the forge or tends the shuttle from sunrise to sunset to be in a condition outside his working hours for anything but sleep? Ah, but you say, Look at Elihu Burritt, at Theodore Parker, and a host of others who have sought knowledge over the midnight oil, and scaled mountains of obstacle almost against fate itself. True; but you forget that these men are the exceptions, giants who come only once or twice in a generation. Would it be fair to gauge the speed of all horses by the Arabian charger, or to condemn the deer on Boston Common because not so fleet of foot as in their God-given mountain home? Still less is it fair to compare all immortal souls with the great intellectual and moral masters, who seem by nature to grasp the very eternities. It may be creditable to the exceptional man that by superhuman effort he achieves success, but it can be no discredit to the mass of mankind that under unfavorable circumstances they fail to do likewise. We must take men as we find them. Shall we say to the workingmen, Go to work, keep contented, "sit up late o' nights," and become Theodore Parkers? We might as well talk to stones; and why? Because there isn't the stuff there out of which Theodore Parkers are made.

See now where this train of thought brings us. Either we must say that the masses are poor, worthless trash, good only as hod-carriers and tenders of machinery, and so to be left as they now are in ignorance, or that our social arrangements must be so changed to meet their wants as to give them time and opportunity for education and culture. We can neither dig under them nor fly above them. We must either entirely ignore them or meet them where they are. To ignore them means—a servile class, and ultimately despotism. To meet them, take them by the hand, lift them up, teach them to lift themselves up, is the only republican way, and therefore for us, who long since in name adopted republican institutions, the only alternative. Now if we are to meet them, it must be at points where they most need help; and inasmuch as their present hours of labor shut them off from education, we must not go to them, saying, "Leopard, change your spots!" or, "Mountain, move!" but, like sensible men, meeting the demand squarely and fairly, we must shorten the hours. Increase the leisure, and fill it to the brim and running over with opportunities. Men talk about education as if that were the great thing; and, broadly viewed, it is. But time and opportunities must precede even that narrow thing which people call education, which consists of a little arithmetic, a smattering of grammar, and a weak show of so-called accomplishments. How much more are they necessary as the forerunners of that truer idea of education, which means the full development of all our faculties, the steady growth of character!

To the objection that the time, if given, will be spent uselessly, perhaps in the grog-shop, it is to be said that, if that be really so, so much the worse for this boasted civilization of ours, which allows such ignorance to exist, and provides so many schoolhouses called bar-rooms for the teaching of such immorality. But is it really so? Would the time be thus spent? Is it not a safe principle of action that opportunities given are opportunities improved? We have carried books and schools to the freedmen at the South, and reports from all quarters show how gratefully every opportunity thus given is embraced. The city of Boston has opened free evening schools, and the crowds unable to gain admittance testify that here, too, opportunities given are opportunities improved. Carry the principle a little further. Give with wise, generous purpose more time and greater opportunities, will the heavens fall? Will more liquor be sold? No, the heavens will remain secure, and less liquor be dispensed; for the laws of the universe will remain unchanged, and the stimulus of culture supersede the stimulus of grog. The following letter received in Anniversary Week of 1872 is too valuable to be omitted in this connection:—

SENATE CHAMBER, 25 May, 1872.

Gentlemen,—I cannot take part in your public meetings, but I declare my sympathy with workingmen. In their aspirations for greater equality of condition and increased opportunities I unite cordially. Therefore I insist that the experiment of an eight-hour law in the national workshops shall be tried, so that, if successful, it may be extended. Here let me confess that I find this law especially valuable because it promises more time for education and general improvement. If the experiment is successful in this respect, I shall be less curious on the question of pecuniary profit and loss, for to my mind the education of the human family is above dollars and dividends. Meanwhile accept my best wishes, and believe me,

Faithfully yours, CHARLES SUMNER.

Such is the legacy the great statesman left a cause in which he was fast becoming interested, and of which, had his life been spared, he would sooner or later have been an earnest advocate.

Now, to put the whole question in a nutshell, let us say:—

1st. Poverty is the great fact with which the labor movement deals.

2d. Its abolition means also the abolition of extreme wealth, and every approximation thereto a more equitable distribution of wealth.

3d. This distribution can never be accomplished by artificial means dealing with the accumulations of the past, but must be sought through the peaceful operation of natural laws, making such accumulations impossible in the future.

4th. All efforts to this end will ultimately result in coöperation, which is the only basis for a just relation between capital and labor.

5th. The greater portion of the world's wealth is now distributed through the wage-system, and every increase of wages which comes from better habits of living will effect a still more equitable distribution, and ultimately result in coöperation. Those measures are to be selected, therefore, which peacefully and naturally tend to this result.

6th. Since the ballot in the hands of the workingwoman means for her opportunities and the opening of a career, it will thus increase her wages; and to this end she, in common with all other women, should be at once endowed with the elective franchise.

7th. A reduction of the hours of labor means time for improvement, and is the essential and natural way into that education which means better habits of living. As a first step, its importance cannot be overrated. It is the primary school of labor reform.

8th. The twin evil of poverty is ignorance, and education of the head, heart, and hands is a necessity. Every advance made toward the abolition of the one is a blow at the other, as well as at intemperance, prostitution, and general crime. The labor movement, thus understood, takes its place as first among the educational forces of our time.

Such, it seems to me, is the philosophy of labor reform. It proposes to teach a knowledge never learned of schools; a knowledge that shall make human life truer to the highest ideals. And it begins where common sense dictates; not up in the clouds calling to the wingless mortals upon this sordid earth to fly, but to the men who are intellectually or morally crawling on their knees it proposes to teach the science of walking. The ballot, it says, means feet for the workingwoman; shortening the hours means feet for all labor. Feet mean improvement of habits of living. Improvement of habits of living means an increase of wants and an increase of real worth, and these effect an increase of wages, through those natural causes which shall bring about a more equitable distribution of wealth.

I said this was a movement which signified revolution. Do you realize, ladies and gentlemen, what that means? It is the gradual growth of the principle of freedom, here and there asserting itself, sometimes in peace, sometimes in war, but always to achieve final success. "There is an irrepressible conflict," said Mr. Seward, "between freedom and slavery." There was one. How many homes can testify to that now! There is an irrepressible conflict between freedom and poverty. Shall we be wise in time, or shall we invoke here, too, the hard hand of war? It seems to me it is for the brains and hearts of the nineteenth century to decide. There are strikes, the outcome of ignorance and passion, the forerunners of conflict,—not, as some think, an utter abomination, nor yet the exclusive property of labor. They have been indulged in in all ages and by all classes. When the clerk says to the merchant, "I must have an increase of salary or leave your employ," he strikes. When the merchant says to the clerk, "Henceforth you must work for a reduced salary or leave my employ," he strikes. Ministers strike, societies strike, and when labor strikes without appealing to forces, it acts upon the same principle, and with quite as much, if not more, excuse; for it knows no better way. Ground down by poverty, it can neither dictate nor argue. There is the whirling machinery before its eyes, which weaves out of the raw material and its drudgery the fabric which capital shall sell and buy. It sees but one way to relieve itself for a single hour, and adopts it. It clogs the wheels; it stops the machine; and then the cultured and so-called religious classes pronounce it barbarous that these ignorant and pestilent fellows should do the only thing they have left it in their power to do. I say they, the cultured and religious classes, because if the state of poverty and ignorance out of which strikes grow exists in the community, they are most responsible for it who, with abundance of wealth and a large degree of knowledge, might do the most, if they would, to prevent it. As it is, labor has no reason to expect sympathy from such quarters. It fights its own battles, therefore, with the one clumsy weapon it possesses, and, so far as any large result is concerned, generally fails. The truth is, one is rarely in a condition to strike successfully, unless in a condition to do something much better than strike. Especially is this true of labor. Unless in striking its demand is at once complied with, it must lie idle for weeks, perhaps months. Usually it does not possess pecuniary ability enough for more than one or (at the outside) two weeks' support. After that it must beg, steal, starve, or surrender, the chances being that the last will be the most difficult thing to do. In the meantime, its antagonist, capital, can hold out for months, perhaps years, shut up its shops, go home and live on the interest of its money; every want gratified, at all events, every necessity met. What an unequal contest! Ease and luxury versus starvation. The majority of strikes reduce the battle to just that point. They enable capital to stand, not like the highway robber, with grip upon the throat, demanding, "Your money or your life!" but with clenched fists and closed money-drawers to exclaim, "Come to terms, brutes, or die!"

While, therefore, the class does not exist which has a right to criticise labor because it strikes, it is nevertheless the duty of every thoughtful man and woman to teach it a better and nobler way. And the first lesson in this department of knowledge must be from the text book of exact justice. In other words, thought must develop and expound the underlying philosophy of the movement, substituting its own peaceful and more effective methods for those of contention and ill-will.

Many of these same objections apply to the method of politics even more popular now than the method of strikes. As at present constituted, politics are given over to fraud and corruption. It is a simple impossibility for a new question to get anything but the most superficial discussion from parties and politicians. Now, every cause must have its era of thorough discussion; its philosophy must be studied and plainly set forth, before any salient points can be arrived at, upon which to found a political party. That the labor question, like every other so vital to national welfare, must sooner or later be carried to the ballotbox, is of course true. That is the democratic way of settling customs and laws; but after all a political party simply records public opinion, and the ballotbox is the place where the record is made. If, as Whittier sings, as true is it that brains and hearts inspiring that vote are "the power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself." The party, and all that goes with it, must be subordinated to the idea. Only as it serves that is it fit to live. To change the figure, parties are mile-stones, not leaders. They mark, as one has said the Church marks, the place up to which humanity has travelled at a given time. Back of, and greater than, parties is the moral agitation of ideas which shall mould them to its purposes and make intelligent political action possible. Agitation, therefore, is the great power in a republic, and it is that to which I would summon the thought of the hour. Strikes, let me repeat, mean war; political action uncurbed by thought means war; moral agitation, greater and deeper and truer than both combined—that, and that alone, holds out the only reasonable hope of peace. Not only as a sympathizer with labor, but as a non-resistant, as one who with O'Connell would welcome no social amelioration at the cost of a single drop of blood, I plead for that. As you value peace, as you value the future of the American experiment in democratic institutions, I urge you to study and investigate the demands of labor. For this problem is thoroughly national in its aims and scope. Aye, more than national: it holds in its keeping the future of the democratic idea. There is no logical terminus between barbarism and freedom, and, whether we will or not, we are on the high road to a pure democracy. Our fathers, wiser than they knew, declared principles good for all time. Our national troubles have all come from departing from the plain propositions they so well laid down. If we are to live as a nation, one after another of the usurpations of which we have been guilty must be abolished. There can be no aristocratic class in a pure democracy, whether of the skin, of intelligence, nativity, condition, or sex. The slave-holding aristocracy, founded on the color of the skin, has been destroyed. The aristocracy of wealth and the aristocracy of sex must follow. The labor movement is an organized protest against the one,—to some extent, as I think, against the other also. Its demands, so far as they are guided by thought, are not unreasonable; they only ask the republic to be true to its own ideals.

> "The crowning fact, the kingliest act of freemen,
> Is the freeman's vote,"

Pardon me if I say in all seriousness that the thoughtful men and women of to-day have a duty to this cause which must not be, cannot be, safely neglected. They may or may not accept my views, but they must study and investigate to the end that they may form views for themselves. How many of the absurdities now advanced in the name of labor would be swept away, if only a dozen thinking men and women in every town in Massachusetts would give it that attention to which it has a just claim. It will never do to excuse yourselves by saying it is agrarian, and crude, and despotic. If it really is so, all the more necessity that you, who are neither agrarian, nor crude, nor despotic, should give it the benefit of your practical, developed, liberty-loving natures. This great idea of freedom in the course of progress is to receive new meaning. Confront the fact of poverty with it! It shall in time dissolve like icebergs under the tropic suns.

> "To honor justice, and to love the right,
> Which friends to friends and State to State unite,
> Be ours. We honor equal aims and ends;
> But still the greater with the less contends,
> And evil times begin."

There is much talk now-a-days of public corruption. What is the real meaning of crédit mobiliers, and salary grabs, and the general low tone of life in official circles? Do you think you can abolish dishonesty in Congress by reforming a few Representatives? Not at all. John Morrissey in the House of Representatives means a constituency of John Morrisseys in New York. Poverty and wealth, we have said, never join hands, save when they go together to vote iniquity at the polls. It is the lust of wealth on the one hand, and the ignorance of poverty on the other, which makes the demagogue's election sure. Whoso would abolish demagogues, let him make education and an honest living possible to all. A reform of the civil service is one of the prominent party watchwords of the day. But the reform needed is the introduction of common honesty into all departments of the government, from the White House down. This will hardly come so long as business is run on the principle of seeing how much each man can cheat his neighbor without being found out. Public men are neither better nor worse than the average public sentiment. A business and general industrial system rotten to the core finds its legitimate fruit in knaves and buffoons in public life, for whose misdeeds your cheeks and mine tingle with shame. With noisy demonstrations they stump States and manipulate legislation, all in the name of the highest principle; while, blind to the wrongs of a large majority of the people,

> "They bawl for freedom in their senseless mood,
> And still revolt when truth would set them free;
> License they mean, when they cry liberty."

And licensed they are to prey upon the public treasury, and corrupt the public morals by those evil influences in social and industrial life of which they are the legitimate representatives. The labor movement does not cover the whole of God's truth; but it means the diffusion of general intelligence and honesty, by destroying the conditions which make ignorance a necessity and corruption a plant of easy growth. When this is done, the demagogue will find himself without a constituency, and the public service cease to be so largely at the mercy of thieves who break through and steal.

> "The discipline of slavery is unknown
> Amongst us,—hence the more do we require
> The discipline of virtue; order else
> Cannot subsist, nor confidence, nor peace.
> * * * * * *
> Trust not to partial care a general good;
> Transfer not to futurity a work
> Of urgent need. Our country must complete
> Her glorious destiny. Begin even now,
> * * * * *
> Now, when corruption is a prime pursuit,
> Shew to the several nations for what end
> The powers of civil polity were given."

It is to such an educational work that the labor movement calls. Said I not rightly it is truly national in its aims and scope? Freedom is constructive, poverty destructive, of all those elements which make a nation truly great. That is what labor says. Its summons is already ringing in your ears. Sooner or later it will be heard. The sooner the better! For in answering its call the Republic of States shall become the democracy of the people, and, marching bravely forward and upward, lead the world to freedom.

THE INDIANS, AND HOW TO TREAT THEM.

ST. PAUL, Minn., March 16, 1874.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

My dear Sir,—I hope you will not require any other apology for this communication than what is given in the subject of it.

After many years of experience with the Indians, and study of their character, habits, and customs, I have become very much interested in their future welfare. I see very clearly that the present policy, and every other thus far suggested, means extermination in the end. My feelings having become so earnestly exercised on the subject, I was led to communicate with Senator Sumner, giving my views, and urging the importance of Congressional action; but his decease ends all hope in that direction at present. In looking over the Congress of the United States, I do not perceive another member who is actuated by so strong a love for humanity. I am now impressed with the fact that the government cannot be brought to act in the right direction, until the public is enlightened on the subject through the press; and as I feel incompetent for the task of doing justice through my own communications, I have determined to write you personally, hoping you would feel it within your province to speak in telling words through THE INDEX.

The solution of the Indian question, I think, is not a difficult one, rightly considered and acted upon. Our failure with the Indians is the result of our losing sight, in our treatment of them, of natural laws. We regard and treat them as children, and are proud of the expression that they are "wards of the government," while denying them the benefits of law. (I believe there is no tribe in America that has the benefit of the civil, and only one the benefits of the criminal, code.) Suppose we had left the Indians just where we found them, scattered over the entire country in their small bands or families, and agreed that they should be as we are, having all the benefits of our laws for the protection of their life and property: would not the Indians to-day have been all absorbed in the body politic? It is not too late now to act on this theory, and treat them like men and citizens by allowing them to settle, each family on its own homestead, subject to the benefits of the regulations provided for other men. As soon as this principle was established, they would become citizens. They would be benefitted by their contact with their white neighbors by adopting their customs and manners, and in return the whites would be benefitted by some of their traits of character, such as affection, generosity, and stoicism. I believe the Indian should be assisted on his way upward by the government; but this assistance should never be as a gift. It should come in the shape of payment for services rendered by his own hands, even if it is for work on his farm or house. He should be taught the value of his labor. In all our dealings with him, we should keep in view the natural law that labor is the great promoter of development, and that nothing is accomplished without effort. By impressing upon the minds of the Indians the necessity of their becoming self-sustaining, they will soon see, as indeed they do now, that their advance to civilization is only to be accomplished by their own efforts. I think that, if the money expended by sectarian missions alone had been used in carrying out this theory, they would have been making rapid strides in mechanics, agriculture, and the useful arts, and we should now hardly realize that we ever had a wild, war-like race to deal with. Instead of their being, as now, entirely dependent children and wards of the government, they would be adding greatly to our material wealth, and contributing something valuable to our national character. Thus would be saved to the government the millions expended in fighting them, not to mention the millions that have been worse than thrown away under the pretence of clothing and feeding them. This money has been really nothing more than the great corruption fund of the nation.

Under the present system we make treaties only to be soon broken on our part; the whole power of the government is exerted to force them on to reservations in a crowd, to hold everything in common, with no personal responsibility, no inducements to individual efforts. How short-sighted this policy, and how unnatural in its working! The object is plain: the whole thing is jobbery and robbery from beginning to end, to enrich contractors and agents. Another bad feature of our present system is that it exposes the Indians to the arts of rival sectarian organizations. In everything they are victims. They are starved and nearly frozen, diseased, and driven to all manner of improprieties. As good old Strike-the-Ree (a chief of the Yankton Indians) once told me, naming his many grievances, "You send your worst class of whites among us, and they ruin our wives and daughters." I give it in his own language. His religious teacher or teachers (I know on our reservation of four denominations contending for the spoils) court him, which naturally leads to the cultivation of indolence. The result is very much in keeping with the missionary work so ably described in the January number of the Westminster Review. The whole reservation system is an insult to their pride and manhood. It debases their better natures, so that, in a very few years of reservation experience, their stoical character is crushed. They lose very soon their self-respect. Thus it goes on from year to year, growing worse all the while; and the country is duped to believe that the government is acting a very humane part towards them.

The Indian wants the protection of law in every respect, and to be let alone, the same as any other citizen; until he gets this justice, there is no hope for him. A white man may outrage him in every way, and he has no redress. A few years ago, in a town I was in, in Kansas, a white man boasted that he had killed sixty Indians. I have no doubt he had, and killed every one of them in cold blood; he was made a hero. The popular cry goes forth for extermination. The law should have said he was a murderer, and treated him accordingly. We hear now of the prospect of a great Indian war. No candid man in the West believes there is a particle of foundation for such apprehension. This cry is raised often by the whites, the object being to get up a military expedition to enrich the managers and a particular section, as if they could not steal enough by the ordinary channels, but must resort to a more barbarous mode. In some instances, the Indians have been exasperated by so many outrages that they have retaliated by hostile demonstrations; but more often these reports of Indian depredations are false, or they have been committed by white men in Indian costume.

Now, my dear sir, I do say earnestly, in the name of everything that is sacred, that this state of things ought to cease. We have too long practised our barbarism, fraud, and corruption, under the false color of trying to civilize the Indian; and I feel that you are the man to do the work of exposing these evils to the world in language that will reach the ear of the nation.

There is no reform that has greater claims upon earnest effort than the reformation of our Indian policy, with the view of bettering the condition of those we have so much wronged. We cannot afford to exterminate them; they are worth saving. We want no more Indian treaties, reservations, or so-called Indian territories; the reservations already established should be subdivided; the Indian should be allowed to take his individual homestead, and the white man allowed to settle near him,—say, on every alternate section. The large territories should be divided, and organized into smaller ones, so that the jurisdiction of each government may be of reasonable extent; there should be a sufficient military force in each, under the direction and control of the civil authorities, to preserve order with the white man as well as the Indian. The idea of turning over the Indians to the management of the military ought to be abandoned at once; for who does not know that the most degraded of all Indians are those about a military post? Besides, the idea of placing the military in power over any class is not in keeping with the spirit of humane government at all. There is too much tendency in the military to arrogance,—too much degradation among the soldiers to promote the development of a race like the Indian.

At Beaver Bay, on the north shore of Lake Superior, there are some Germans settled in the lumber business. A large number of the Pigeon River reservation Indians have left their reservation, and are settled with the German families, and they depend upon their help entirely to carry on their business. Very little money is paid to those Indians annually, and hence there is no object in forcing them back on their reservation; and the consequence is they are living in their little houses, working for their daily wages, and are comfortable and happy. This only illustrates what might be the effect all over the country, if the temptations to fraud and corruption were removed by doing away with the present Indian system, and treating them in the future like men, and not like babes. I hope you may become the benefactor of the Indians by advocating their cause in THE INDEX. Yours very truly, B. M. SMITH.

[The best we can do is to publish Mr. Smith's earnest and eminently rational plea for the Indians. The method and policy he indicates seem to us to carry their own recommendation with them. If THE INDEX were what we have in sanguine moments dreamed it might become—a journal so widely circulated as to reach every free mind and noble heart in the land; or if the powers at Washington did not seem deaf to every suggestion not backed up by a bottomless purse and an army of lobbyists,—then its "telling words" might be something better than the tinkling of a bell in a vacuum. So far as its voice can be heard, however, it will be heard in favor of treating the Indians as men, and not as wolves; in favor of justice as against rapacity and cruelty. Our information is too scanty with reference to the subject above treated to make our word of much weight; but we are very glad to give place to such a valuable statement as Mr. Smith has made, and to express a hope that it may reach those who have power to act on its wise and humane suggestions.—ED.]

THE DEATH OF JOSIAH WARREN.

At the meeting of the Boston Council, No. 1, of the "Sovereigns of Industry," on Wednesday evening, April 15, the following resolutions in commemoration of the life and character of Josiah Warren were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be placed on the records of the society:—

Whereas, This Council of the Sovereigns of Industry have heard with deep emotion of the death of that eminent thinker and experimenter in social reform, Josiah Warren, whose writings and example unfold principles of the most vital importance for securing a better civilization based on justice and co-operation, we deem it fitting that we place on record our profound appreciation of his worth as a man, and of his genius as an original and masterly student of the deepest problems of political economy. Therefore,

Resolved, That we pay our heartiest tribute to the blameless and beautiful character, the pure and heroic life, of this devoted friend of the laboring classes, this self-sacrificing and unwearied thinker and toiler for the rights and welfare of all men.

Resolved, That such a character and such an example as that of Josiah Warren reflect glory on human nature, and confirm our noblest hopes by their prophecy of a time to come when the discords and wrongs of our present civilization shall end, and the life of society be perfected in equity, love, freedom, and happiness.

Resolved, That those who knew Mr. Warren most, and understood him best, have the comfort of feeling that he died in peaceful faith, in a ripe age, and that his fame is likely to grow illustrious, as years pass and bring to full fruit the seeds he planted.

GOVERNOR DIX'S MESSAGE.

ALBANY, Tuesday, April 7.

Governor Dix sent the following message to the Legislature this morning:—

STATE OF NEW YORK,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, April 7, 1874.

To the Legislature:—

I deem it due to the interest and honor of the State to call upon you, as its chosen representatives, to take into consideration the propositions before Congress in regard to the currency. Though yet immature and requiring the concurrent action of both Houses to give them the validity of law, they have, nevertheless, received in each such partial sanction as to excite serious alarm as to the result. In my annual message, in January last, I expressed the earnest hope that the paper circulation issued by the government would be curtailed, and that early steps would be taken to resume specie payments. I did not anticipate that so extraordinary a proposition as that of inflating the currency by adding to outstanding legal tender notes, or by authorizing a further issue of national bank paper, would be seriously made. In view of the purpose which has been indicated to enlarge the volume of paper of both descriptions, and to repudiate all attempts to reëstablish the standard of specie—a policy, as I sincerely believe, fraught with wide-spread ruin to the industry of the country, and with imminent danger to its credit—I invoke your interposition to contribute all in your power to prevent its adoption. Your opinion, representing as you do more largely than the Legislature of any other State the financial and commercial interests of the Union, should carry with it great weight.

The flagrant injustice of the proposed measure will be the more apparent when you consider that, if adopted without repealing the legal tender act, the result will be not only to depreciate the paper currency still further, but to compel its acceptance in payment of debts, thus openly violating the solemnly proclaimed pledge of the government, five years ago, to redeem its notes in specie at the earliest practicable period, impairing the obligation of contracts, and consummating what the Constitution prohibits to the States as an act of moral and political turpitude. To degrade the currency, and at the same time to compel the people to receive it as equivalent to specie, would be the most tyrannical exercise and abuse of financial power of which a civilized government has ever been guilty in time of peace. It differs in no essential respect, either under its moral or its practical effects, from a degradation of the standard of specie by an adulteration of the national coin.

Five years ago, the sense of rectitude would have revolted at the suggestion of such an act of perfidy; but a persistence in wrong and injustice rarely fails to reconcile further wrong to the thought first and to the purpose afterward. If, spurning away all the teachings of history, and trampling under foot all the maxims of political justice, we adopt a policy as fraudulent as it is demoralizing, our successors will look back on our conduct with humiliation and shame. The millions of depreciated and irredeemable paper, if issued as proposed, will, by a law of distribution which no human power can control, be poured into the city of New York to uphold and stimulate stock-gambling; to glut the channels of industry, embarrass all honest transactions of business; to cause reactions in the various departments of labor by which the working classes are thrown out of employment, and to shake to its foundations the fabric of the public credit.

Against the introduction of such an instrument of dishonor and calumny we should enter our solemn protest, as we would against any other flood of contamination. I speak with a clear understanding of the force of my words. I believe and trust you will concur with me in the opinion that the emergency demands the plainest and most emphatic language. I therefore recommend such an expression on your part as may comport with the dignity of the Legislature, and as you may deem due to the interests of your constituents. I am not without hope that a timely declaration of your views, to be presented to Congress through the Senators and Representatives from this State, may arrest the torrent of disgrace and disaster with which the country is threatened from this source. If your protests and warnings are unheeded, you will have the consolation of reflecting, when the evil comes upon us, that no effort on your part has been spared to avert it. JOHN A. DIX.

Resolutions were adopted by the Senate, endorsing Governor Dix's message, and asserting that the judgment of the Legislature of New York is, that it is the duty of the administration at Washington and of Congress to stay the pernicious and ruinous policy of increasing the volume of irredeemable paper currency, and to take measures for speedy resumption of specie payments. Copies will be sent to members of Congress.—Boston Globe.

"UPPER" AND "LOWER."

BY S. H. M.

Ah me! and is it so—
Thou above, and these below?
Measure now this value well—
Who's above no fool can tell.
He is wise whose eye undimmed
Not the world of things hath skimmed,
But the central fire doth see,
Flame of the eternity.

Set the world apart in rows;
Preach the savageness of blows;
Preach—and, while thy gospel-note
Echoes to the hills remote,
Dull the ears thy message heed:
"High" and "low" sow armed seed.

High and low—
'Tis well to know
Of the deep
Each soul doth keep.
Whirls the globe in heavenly space,
Evermore the sun doth chase,
Pauseless 'mid his flooding light,
Onward through the depths of night.

Listen now, thou proudest one!
Perfect not thyself alone:
To the universe is thy fate wed,
By the whole is thy life fed.
Let the justice of the sky
Banish once thy "low" and "high,"
Soon thine eye'll delighted find
How equal stands all human kind.

GLIMPSES.

Sumner and—Washburn! "Oh, what a fall was there, my countrymen!"

A lady of our acquaintance jestingly remarked, with reference to "Dress Reform," that the reform most to be desired was—"new dresses, and more of them!"

The Free Religious Society of St. Louis has the following officers: President, Dr. T. J. Dean; Vice-President, H. E. Sharpe; Secretary, H. C. O'Bleness.

The New York Assembly has passed a compulsory education act, requiring that all children between the ages of eight and fifteen years shall be instructed, either at school or at home, during at least fourteen weeks each year, in the common English branches. This is a move in the right direction.

The funeral of Josiah Warren was held on April 17, at Bulfinch Street Chapel, Boston. Addresses were made by Mr. Stevens, Mr. Morse, and Mr. Alger. The aged reformer was buried at Mount Auburn with the honor and reverence due to him; but his ideas still live and throb in loyal hearts. Peace to his ashes!

The "Compulsory Education Bill" in Louisiana passed the Senate by a vote of 18 to 10, but did not reach the House. We are glad to see that Mrs. J. R. Walker and Mr. Wm. F. Perkins, of New Orleans, occasional articles by whom have appeared in The Index, have been active in calling public attention to this excellent measure, and urging its merits.

The first number of the Freethinker, edited by Dr. Friedrich Leiss in New York, has articles on "Who is a Freethinker?" "The Religion of Humanity vs. the Religions of Superstition," "Causality," "Cremation vs. Interment," and "The Poetry of the Future." It is a vigorous and thoughtful monthly of sixteen octavo pages, and is only twenty-five cents a year. Address "Freethinkers' Publishing Company," Box 2675, New York City.

James Russell Lowell, in his long poem on Agassiz in the Atlantic Monthly, calls this country "The Land of Broken Promise." It is mortifying that such a reproach should come from such a source. But is it undeserved? Ask yourself mentally how many of your fellow-citizens regard a promise as inviolably sacred. The ancient Persians were taught "to ride, to shoot, and to tell the truth;" but if modern Americans are satisfied with keeping a promise merely when it is convenient, the hatchet-and-cherry-tree story is not enough to put them on a level with the Persians.

An adjourned meeting of persons interested in taking measures to care for the neglected classes at North End, especially the children, was held last Thursday evening at the rooms of the New England Woman's Club. The spirit of the meeting was earnest and hopeful, and great good may yet come of it, though it is too soon to say much about it. At that very same hour, as a satirical illustration of the necessity of such measures, our own home was broken into in our absence, and about a hundred and fifty dollars' worth of silver stolen—not much, to be sure, but about all we had, and valued chiefly for the givers' sake. It was rather a biting jest. But all the more do we desire the success of the experiment at North End, that other homes may be spared such visitations.

CAUSES AND CURES.

What is the matter with the world? Why is it not happy and pure—a veritable "kingdom of heaven"? What is the great cause of the miseries that afflict mankind?

"Sin," says the Church.

"Ignorance," says science.

"Poverty," says commerce.

"Intemperance, prostitution, war, the subjection of women, the oppression of labor," says reform.

Such answers as these might be multiplied; and there is truth in them all. But the whole truth is in none of them. Philosophy looks at the evils of human society as in a large degree inevitable, resulting from the fact that society is still in the making, under the great law of evolution. It sees that civilization is necessarily relative and imperfect, and consists in constant amelioration rather than in the actual attainment of a perfect or ideal state. It perceives that all amelioration depends on increasing, by intelligent adaptation, the degree of harmony already existing between man and his environment. It comprehends that there is and can be no short cut to the abolition of all evils, no royal road to general blessedness, no infallible panacea for what is supposed to be disease or derangement, when in fact the trouble is not so much malady as immaturity. It discerns the unwisdom of excessive reliance on specifics under whatever name, be it that of regeneration, education, peace, equal distribution of wealth, total abstinence, woman suffrage, cost principle, labor reform, or any other. These may or may not tend to bring man into a higher conformity with his own nature and the nature of things; but philosophy must rate all special ameliorations as parts only of a universal process which cannot but be a long one at the best, and is only made longer by pushing any one of them as if it were sufficient and sole. The habit of inveighing against the existing state of things as unmitigated barbarism, the ambition to "reconstruct" or "re-organize" society on some novel plan of suspicious simplicity, is especially misleading. Whoever bears in mind the exceeding patience the universe has manifested in attaining its present stage of evolution will not be disposed to wipe the slate clean, and start all over again.

We do not aspire to do more than make a few suggestions on this vast subject, chief of which is the wisdom of shaping all our reformatory efforts with reference to the great law of universal evolution. The time-honored recipe of Christianity, though somewhat in disfavor with the semi-modernized branches of the Church, is a "new heart," and a "new creation" of the world after the "pattern shown in the Mount." The Church starts with "sin" as the cause of all social evil, and assumes the necessity of making mankind all over again by a process of "regeneration" or "salvation." No matter what phraseology may disguise this remedy, it is substantially the same as prescribed by all but the most latitudinarian sects, which retain the faintest possible flavor of the original gospel in their preaching. Individual transgression of an arbitrary command first sank the world in sin; individual transgression perpetuates the curse; and individual redemption will remove it. Sin is the explanation of all man's miseries; sin is inherent in man's individual nature and choices. Hence the ecclesiastical theory of his reformation can take account of nothing but his individual relation to the Holy Spirit or its representative, the Church. The idea of a continuous evolution of humanity under natural law is utterly alien to Christianity; and the plan of reforming individuals by influencing them through changes in their social environment, or of seeking the general advancement of society itself by setting natural causes to work, is tantamount to a negation of Christian theology.

Nevertheless, the only reformatory method which promises really valuable results is precisely that. The influence of sin in producing the great evils of society has been, and still is, even among radical circles, greatly exaggerated. These evils result largely from unwholesome general conditions rather than depraved individual volitions; and the wisest of all efforts is to rectify these bad conditions. Take the case of those hot-beds of vice to be found in all our large cities,—the overcrowded, unhealthy tenement houses which it is almost impossible to abolish, because they pay their grasping proprietors twenty, thirty, and even forty per cent. profit on the money invested in them. Whole families packed away in small, close, dark, fetid apartments, men, women and children all together, with no possibility of privacy or self-respect,—gloomy and dirty lanes swarming with children of all ages, who are exposed unprotected to the contamination and contagion of the worst examples,—what can be expected of such poor victims of society's injustice and neglect but careers of perpetual crime? What use is it to send missionaries of the sin-and-salvation gospel to such as these? What hope of any real alleviation of the wretchedness here so rank, or any abatement of the iniquity here generated, until decent homes are provided, at reasonable rents, that shall render decency in the inmates at least possible? All the preaching in Christendom must be as water poured into a sieve, so long as these horrible outward conditions are left unchanged. The root of the evil is not sin, but dirt, squalor, bad air, want of room, violation of every condition that virtue requires. Especially is the situation of children, born thus to a sure heritage of degradation and misery, to be lamented and promptly relieved. We are all guilty, every one of us, if we take no interest in plans for rectifying these evils by rational methods; though their vast extent may well strike dismay to the most sanguine heart. The sin-theory of the Church breaks down utterly in dealing with them, as does also the method which that theory prescribes. Society ought, in sheer self-defence, to take vigorous and early measures for treating such cases of moral pestilence as it would treat them if small-pox were concerned. Why not have a Board of Safety from Crime, as well as a Board of Health? It is the insane sin-theory of the Church that prevents. When the teachings of philosophy and social science have taken the place of this obstructive superstition, society will be roused to as keen a sense of danger from such reeking haunts of moral corruption as it is now quick to feel when the cholera breaks out. Meanwhile we all suffer the consequences of our own neglect, and have little right to complain when we experience the fruits of it in person. That is the way that new light breaks in upon the world, and even thus the new light is cheaply bought.

JOSIAH WARREN.

The following is the substance of some remarks made at the funeral of Mr. Warren, Friday, April 17.

I feel it to be a privilege to be permitted to say a few words at the funeral of Josiah Warren. I cannot claim the right to do so by virtue of any well established friendship with the deceased, nor even of long acquaintance with him. Neither is the right of speech mine on this occasion because I ever specially have championed the peculiar views of Mr. Warren, or presumed to be an instructor of others in them. I feel that I inadequately have studied Mr. Warren's doctrines,—that I but imperfectly understand them; and it would therefore ill become me to presume to expound them, or to attempt to instruct other minds as to their nature and bearing. My acquaintance with him personally has been all too brief, although, in a few short interviews with the man, I have had some real communion with him.

By virtue, therefore, of no right such as I have named, am I here to speak to-day, but merely by privilege for which I am grateful; by the kind invitation of those who were his trusted friends, and whose privilege it has been to have known him long and well, to have ministered to him in his last sickness, to have listened to some of the wisest words that dropped from his lips, and whose privilege now it is to have the last care for his material remains.

I cannot help inquiring as to the significance of this assembly here to-day. It is composed in part of many who knew Mr. Warren scarcely more than by reputation. The weather itself is very inclement, and naturally might have been expected to keep most of us away. Why then are we here? Our presence is not a tribute to a great name, albeit Mr. Warren's was not unknown to a small but highly intelligent circle in this country, and had reached even across the Atlantic, and been spoken with respect and honor by one of England's most eminent men. Yet Mr. Warren was a modest man, and never sought to make himself famous as he easily might have done. Our presence then is not a tribute to his reputation; it is only a tribute to his character. We know him to have been a true man and a just. We feel him to have been noble, brave, and magnanimous. And so we are here to honor him for his manly qualities, and ourselves are honored by his life and his mute presence with us.

Was Mr. Warren a reformer? Not in the ordinary sense of that word. He sought to improve society, but not by manipulating its framework; not by mending its machinery here, and by patching it there. He brought an idea, a principle, to its cure. Mr. Warren believed that we have no true society to-day; no true commonwealth, no true civilization. And so he did not seek to reform society, but to reorganize it; nay, rather, to disorganize it, and to build it anew on principles more just, and by methods more equitable. He was not a revolutionist, or a mobocrat. The revolution he sought was one of ideas, and he would have worked it out peaceably. He would have planted new ideas, which should impart a new vitality, and which should create a new, a glorious, and harmonious society.

Was Mr. Warren, then, an idealist? Yes, truly he was. But do you associate that word with a dreamer? Well, then, Mr. Warren was a dreamer. But how beautiful were his dreams! Yet he dreamed them, not in sleep nor in indolence, but when he was wide awake and hard at work. He dreamed so of a "true civilization" more fair than any ideal republic conceived of by any master mind of old.

As early, he once told me, as when he was fourteen years old, he began to think of society as it was and of society as it ought to be. He looked about him, and he saw misery, crime, poverty, and hard, grasping selfishness. He saw the poor growing poorer, the rich growing richer, and the gulf daily widening between the social classes. He trembled for the future of his country and his race, if this process should go on. And he said to himself, "What is the matter?" The radical, revolutionary, momentous question had been asked; and even then the earnest, thoughtful, enthusiastic boy set himself the task of answering it.

All his life long, Mr. Warren steadily, heroically worked at the self-appointed task of trying to answer this question. And he believed that he had answered it. He believed that he had discovered the principle, which, if adopted and carried out in good faith, would reëstablish and rehabilitate society, and cleanse it clean of those foul leprosies that now are destroying its very life. Those who would know what his discoveries and his doctrines were must read and study his social theories as set forth in his published writings.

And because he was a man of ideas, and was true and faithful to them utterly, we are here to reverence and do honor to him now. Though he stood so stoutly for individualism, he exercised one of the individual's highest rights to sacrifice himself for his ideas. This is what commands our unhesitating homage. He tried to live his own ideal life, and he did it through poverty, neglect, and loneliness.

Here now he lies in what we call death. How refreshing it is! His long day's work is done; darkness, the darkness of the grave, summons him from his labor, and we say to him, "Good night!" Ah, it is harder and more heroic to live than it is to die! Who of us has not come on the time when it would have been easier for us to die than to live; to go down into death's stillness and calm, than to turn and take up again life's hard work, face its stern duties, and bear its trials and disappointments? Yet life is noble, and its tasks both noble and necessary. And while we say to our brother, "Farewell, true man and true philanthropist!" we will turn again to our own life-work, and try to live as true and faithful to our ideas as he did to his. A noble life will make a noble death!

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—Our social instincts are, fortunately for us, ever asserting themselves, and leading to organizations more or less powerful.

Hitherto, in England, and especially in London, free thinkers have been scattered about in little theological or scientific coteries, and even in comparative isolation; and in consequence of this separation, incidental at first, their influence has been retarded, though by no means wholly lost.

At a meeting of the London Students' Union—a society, by the way, which certainly failed to make any impression on "students," and was composed chiefly of men and women in middle life—it was wisely proposed by the Rev. R. R. Suffield (whose name and Roman Catholic antecedents must be well known to your readers) to extend the operations of the society in the direction which it had manifestly taken.

This suggestion eventually took practical shape in the transformation of the old society into a new one, under the title of the "Liberal Social Union,"—the main object being to gather together all free thinkers of every school of thought and of every shade of liberality. The meetings were to be of a social character, such as are commonly known under the foreign names of soirées, conversaziones, etc., at which papers should be read, followed by general discussion.

Members would thereby be brought in contact with each other, and at the same time there would be an instructive mode of passing the time—no one to be excluded from membership on account of any religious, political, or speculative opinions.

At first starting we numbered about one hundred and fifty members, and our first soirée was attended by nearly four hundred visitors, many of whom will in all probability become enrolled.

A paper was read on "Openness and Reserve in the Expression of our Religious Opinions," a subject remarkably suitable to such an inauguration, and handled with great skill and vigor by the writer, Dr. Morell, one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools. This paper is being brought out by Mr. Thomas Scott. The reading was followed by an animated discussion, most opportunely commenced by an orthodox clergyman of the Church of England, representing the Broad school, and therefore somewhat open to the charge of "reserve," which he tried his best to defend. Before such an audience, however, his attempt signally failed.

Then came Mr. Conway, who put in a plea for "openness" on all points of morality, as well as on religion. He was followed by a Miss Marshall, whom it was a treat to listen to, for her fluency and good sense.

Other speeches were made, among which the most popular was that of Mr. Suffield, who must have felt delighted at the success of his idea.

Mr. William Shaen occupied the chair, and I need not say that, wherever he presides, he is welcomed with acclamation.

I noticed two or three clergymen of the Church of England there, besides some who had laid down their orders and gone to the bar, etc. It was certainly as well mixed a gathering as we could have desired. Nearly all the sects were represented, and, most gratifying of all, a large party of Jews with their families, and Hindus, Parsees, and Japanese.

One must not make prophecies till after their fulfilment; but the first soirée of the "Liberal Social Union" gave promise of being a very fruitful source of improvement and progress.

I must now tell you of the formation of another society lately instituted, which aims at a beneficial reform of the highest importance.

In January last, Sir Henry Thompson, M.D., invited a few friends to talk over the subject of cremation, on which he had been writing his now famous article in the Contemporary Review for January, 1874. There were eight of us altogether, among whom was the lamented Shirley Brooks, late editor of Punch. The other names I will not mention without permission. We then and there founded the "Cremation Society" on the following basis:—

"We disapprove the present custom of burying the dead, and desire to substitute some mode which shall rapidly resolve the body into its component elements by a process which cannot offend the living, and shall render the remains absolutely innocuous. Until some better method is devised, we desire to adopt that usually known as cremation."

The next thing was to pursue investigation by experiment, which Sir Henry Thompson undertook to do, and the results of which he has given to the world through the Contemporary Review for March. Nothing could be more complete or satisfactory than these experiments, as regards the decency, inoffensiveness, and economy of the process.

Some further investigation will have to be made in reference to the law of the land. It is well known that there exist no statutes against the process, but the Act of Uniformity may possibly present some difficulty to clergymen who may wish to see cremation supersede burial, but must continue to use the burial service of the Prayer Book. For my own part, I do not apprehend any difficulty on this point, inasmuch as the Church already permits of a deviation from the original formula in the service for burial at sea.

If the religious rites of burial are performed before cremation, the phrase might be, "Therefore we commit the body to the flames;" and if performed after cremation, the minister might say, "We commit the ashes to the tomb."

The society is now announced to the world, and all persons who desire to join it, or to promote its objects, are invited to send their names to the Secretary, Wm. Gassie, Esq., C. E., 1 Great-Winchester Street Buildings, London, E. C. I hope that this letter may be fruitful in bringing over hundreds of names from America.

What has surprised me most is the fact that so many orthodox Christians have warmly embraced the idea whenever I have put it before them.

It is with a pardonable pride that I regard my association with the first effort of the kind which has been made in this country.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

Charles Voysey.

Sex and Education. A Reply to Dr. E. H. Clarke's Sex in Education. Edited, with an Introduction, by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1874.

This little volume is made up of criticisms upon Dr. Clarke's book, by a dozen or more writers, every one of whom is, in the main, opposed to the position he takes in regard to the co-education of young men and women. The tendency of each article is to undermine the basis of what Dr. Mercy B. Jackson calls Dr. Clarke's "pet theory that women must not do mental or physical work during certain periods."

Mr. Higginson, quite at large, shows that Dr. Clarke did not consult statistics as he ought in forming inferences so broad, and that his generalizations are based upon an extremely limited number of facts, several of which are indeed disproved as misstatements. Even on the supposition that Dr. Clarke's objections to co-education are well founded, Mr. Higginson does away with them entirely by suggesting such a change in the general collegiate curriculum as would be "only a quiet carrying out of what is already the marked tendency of Harvard,—to substitute elective for required studies, voluntary attendance on exercises for required attendance, and examinations as tests of scholarship in place of daily marks." As to the additional expense of admitting women to Harvard, which Dr. Clarke puts at the sum of two millions, Mr. Higginson says (for what seem to be good reasons) that he "does not see why it should cost a cent." Mrs. Mann testifies to the success and good effects of co-education at Antioch College. She says: "The health of the girls was much better than that of the young men." Mrs. Badger, from personal acquaintance with the same institution for a period of ten years, says: "Out of the twenty-seven graduates, between 1857 and 1863, all but three, whose post-graduated history has been unreported, are known to have done effective work for a longer or shorter term of years, in educational and other departments; and a large number of them have blooming families to rise up and call them blessed." No one of these writers,—among whom are Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Dall, and Miss Phelps, in addition to those ladies already named, and who, being women, and possessing understanding and culture, certainly should be supposed to know something of the laws and necessities of their own nature,—agrees with Dr. Clarke that the exigencies of woman's constitution, at any period of her life, need seriously interrupt any reasonable exertion of mental or physical power; and they all claim that the true causes of the failure of health in young women must be sought elsewhere than in those alleged by Dr. Clarke. Certainly it would seem that Nature had not done her work well, if, in carrying out her processes, one-fourth or one-eighth of the time of woman must necessarily be in a great measure lost to her. The demands upon strength, both of brain and muscle, responded to by women as wives, mothers, and teachers, together with various other avocations in which they engage, as well as that of continuous study, seem to refute such an idea; and it has always been stated that women in the savage state suffer no disabilities of times or seasons, even childbirth offering no serious interruption to labor or travel.

By personal observation, as a practical teacher for many years, I have known young ladies go through a school term, and even a school year, without losing a day or a recitation, and still retain their usual health. Absences and failures to meet appointments were attributable generally to want of interest in study, to a readiness to be drawn away by other attractions, to weakness of purpose and of principle, and to a baneful habit of dilatoriness and unpunctuality,—to one or all of these causes, far oftener than to inability of attendance on account of health. At the academy where I was educated, young men and women pursued studies in common, and recited together, and no one ever dreamed of questioning the ability of the girls to keep fully up with the young men, without the least injury to their health; indeed, it always seemed that the girls, with less effort, tended naturally to get ahead of the boys. The same was true in different institutions in which I have been a teacher, where co-education was practised.

There are reasons in abundance for the deplorable and almost universal breaking-down of the health of women at the present day, entirely aside from those assigned by Dr. Clarke. The evil dates back to causes operating before the birth of the young women now upon the stage. The fathers and mothers, either from ill-adaptedness to each other, from want of moral and physical soundness, or from both combined, have not given them an honest start in life. They have little or no stamina to build upon. Then there is in the training of children a deplorable ignorance of physiological functions and the laws of health, on the part of parents. Joined to this is the miserable ambition, on the part of many, of early bringing their children forward to make a show in the world, rather than of laying the foundation of solid knowledge and worth. Consequently, young ladies are eager to "finish their education," and to "come out" into society. They undertake to accomplish between the ages of twelve and sixteen what ought to extend to the age of eighteen or twenty. Schools, both public and private, are largely modelled upon this high-pressure principle, to which is added the exciting stimulus of emulation. The Boston public schools seem to constitute no exception to this charge. I have known young ladies so crowded and oppressed with the claims of these schools upon them that their nervous systems were wrought up to a degree that threatened entire prostration of health.

Other causes of the failing health of school-girls are that they attend dancing-parties, theatres, and other places of amusement which break in upon the hours which should be devoted to sleep; they neglect proper exercise; they are imprudent in their diet, eating at all times, and devouring all manner of indigestible substances; sufficient care is not taken that they have pure air to breathe, either at home or in school; they add much exciting novel-reading to the tax upon brain and nerves; and, added to all these injurious influences, is their manner of dressing, which involves tight lacing, paddings which produce unnatural heat in some parts of the body, together with unnatural coldness, through scarcity of clothing, in other portions, and thus deranging the even distribution of the circulating fluid; also the excessive weight of skirts, dragging upon important muscles which already have work enough to do. These sins in regard to dress alone are amply sufficient to produce all the evils which Dr. Clarke attributes to that continuous mental application which would be involved in co-education. Girls should have imparted to them a more thorough knowledge of the principles of hygiene than they usually receive, and they should be impressed with a deeper sense of the moral obligation they are under to avoid violating any of the laws of their physical well-being.

There is truth in the idea advanced by Miss Phelps, and some other writers in this little book, that many young ladies lose their health after leaving school in consequence of coming into a condition of perfect inanity, from having no avenue of agreeable and interesting exertion open to them. The mental and physical depression arising from this state is enough of itself to derange all the healthful bodily functions. There have been instances of the kind alluded to, where the adoption of a course of study which called forth the energies of the mind, and gave food for thought, has proved the best means for the recovery of health.

The last critique in this book is a sarcastic article by Maria A. Elmore, in which she says: "Dr. Clarke talks as though women in everything but college life had perfect liberty to change at will their position from the erect to the reclining; as though a regular, sustained, and uninterrupted course of work was something of which they had never had any experience." And she asks derisively: "Has Dr. Clarke written a book on Sex in Manufacturing Establishments? on Sex in Clerkships, Sex in Workshops, or Sex in Sewing?" She goes on to show that remission from regular labor is as much required in these cases as in that in which co-education is involved. She draws a ludicrous picture of the school teacher and the house-maid, who, in applying for a situation, should make the condition that, at stated intervals, they must be relieved from all consecutive labor.

The book closes with testimony in regard to Vassar College, Antioch College, Michigan University, Lombard University, and Oberlin College, all tending to invalidate the truth of the theory on which Dr. Clarke bases his argument against the co-education of young men and women. A. H.

AID TO DISCHARGED CONVICTS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Friend,—I am sure it was not of your own knowledge that you affirmed (among the "Glimpses" in THE INDEX of the 9th instant) "the absence of any proper care for discharged [State Prison] convicts." Whether a better administrator than the present Warden be desirable, and a better system of operation within the prison, I will not undertake to say, though I would not settle either question affirmatively on the testimony of the particular discharged convict who lately addressed the Second Radical Club. But if he denied the absence of any proper care in aid of convicts at and after their discharge, he not only perverted the facts, but gave false testimony, knowing it to be false. Not only good counsel and friendly coöperation in the attempt to gain honest employment, but material aid according to the necessities of the case, is offered to every convict when he leaves the prison; and every convict, some days or weeks before being discharged, has the opportunity of full conference with the agent who administers this aid, to make known his necessities and his wishes. This agent is employed by "The Massachusetts Society for Aiding Discharged Convicts," among the directors of which are Dr. S. G. Howe, Judge Russell, William I. Bowditch, Esq., Robert F. Wallcutt, and Dr. Winslow Lewis. No one who knows these gentlemen will readily believe that they intrust the funds and the work of this Association, year after year, to one who either abuses or neglects his business. On the other hand, while many inmates of a penal establishment are likely to find fault with their treatment under any circumstances, the loudest, most sweeping, and most persistent complaints are sure to come from the vicious and ill-disposed. When a man is resolved not to try honest industry, he will naturally be dissatisfied with the person who offers to procure it for him.

C. K. WHIPPLE.

BOSTON, April 11, 1874.

[Perhaps our language would have been less liable to misunderstanding, if we had said—"the absence of any sufficient care for discharged convicts." We intended no reflections upon the State Agent; but the necessity of far more efficient aid than can be rendered by a single individual who has exceedingly limited means at his command is very clear. Since receiving the above communication, we have inquired of Mr. James Burns what aid he himself received on leaving the prison, and his statement will be found below. It is evident that more adequate provision needs to be made at the most critical period of the prisoner's life, when he will be drawn back by irresistible circumstances into the vortex of crime, unless judicious succor rescues him to a better fate. We only say that the utmost the State Agent can do is and will be insufficient without the coöperation of society itself, which now terribly neglects its own duties to the prisoner; and that we are confident Mr. Whipple would not be understood to intimate suspicion of Mr. Burns' statement.—ED.]

WHAT ARE DISCHARGED PRISONERS TO DO?

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

Please permit me through the columns of your valuable paper to make a few statements that may be the means of calling direct attention to the condition of discharged prisoners, and procuring for them more pecuniary assistance than is now furnished them.

I was discharged from the Massachusetts State Prison on the fourth of last November, after serving a sentence of five years. I received an ill-fitting, filthy, ragged suit of clothes, $4.00 in money from the Warden, and a $5.00 ticket to New York from the State Agent. The coat was darned in many places, very filthy, and the stench emitted from it was so offensive that the friends at whose house I stopped were obliged to wrap it in paper and throw it into the wood-shed. The shirt was much worn, had two large holes in the bosom, and a large patch on the back. I could not have worn it more than one week. On the steamer, going to New York, the third night after my release, my other clothes were falling from me; my pants ripped in the seat, the buttons fell off, my suspenders broke, and, had it not been for the liberality of my friends, I should have been obliged to walk the streets of New York, Thanksgiving morning, in a condition calculated to attract the attention and excite the ridicule and aversion of those who passed me. The coat and shirt I wore a few hours; the rest I wore three days.

After my return to Boston, about five weeks after my release from prison, I received from the State Agent two changes of under-garments, a white shirt, two pairs of socks, and a box of paper collars, all of the poorest and cheapest quality. This was all I received for my five years of hard labor.

I have mentioned these facts, because it is of the utmost importance that the public should know the amount of aid rendered to discharged prisoners.

Mine is not an exceptional case; there are large numbers discharged from our different prisons annually in a condition similar to mine, and many in a much worse state. Nearly all the clothes given to released prisoners are those worn by men when they are brought to prison. A well-known Boston detective told me that he knows nearly every man discharged from the State Prison from the clothes which he has on.

Ex-Warden Haynes informed me that, when he was Warden, he gave each man a new suit of clothing, if he preferred it. He had constantly on hand different qualities of cloth; and, about a month before a prisoner's discharge, he was allowed to select his own cloth and be measured for his suit. The statutes say that no man shall be discharged from prison without a "decent" suit of clothes. This statute is being constantly violated, as can be proven, if necessary.

Now I ask that the word "decent" be changed to new, so that each discharged prisoner shall receive a new suit. Not an expensive and fashionable suit, worth $40.00 or $50.00; but a plain, substantial suit, worth $15.00.

I ask also that each man discharged shall receive more pecuniary aid than is now furnished him. How long would my four dollars have lasted me, if I had been friendless and homeless? I have learned that there is a society for aiding discharged prisoners. I do not know that there is such a society in existence. I have received no personal aid from it. I never saw one of that society, and never was informed by any of the prison officers that there was such a society. No released prisoner has yet told me that he has received any assistance from its members. It is all a myth to me. If there is such a society, it would be well for some of the members to make themselves visible to those in absolute need of their sympathy and aid, that they may not be obliged to steal to earn a livelihood. If I had been friendless, and obliged to apply for work in the condition I was in when discharged, not one in a hundred would have employed me. Admitting that clothes do not make the man, yet the generality of persons are apt to judge the habits and character of a man by his external appearance, and would be more likely to employ me if I presented myself in a decent condition.

But released prisoners require more than slight pecuniary aid. They need sympathy and encouragement, and to be put where good influences will surround them. They are now regarded with too much indifference, distrust, and oftentimes aversion, by a great many people. This is wrong. They are only to be reclaimed by sympathy, encouragement, and a proper degree of confidence. I have recently been informed of an instance of a man who was employed in a certain establishment in Boston for several months, conducting himself properly, and giving his employer the best satisfaction; but his employer suddenly dismissed him, upon accidentally learning that he was a discharged prisoner.

Another case: a man who had served five years in the State Prison obtained employment in a shoe manufactory in this State, and at first received $18.00 per week. His employer, after a few months, learned the circumstance of his life, and took advantage of his knowledge by reducing the man's wages to $12.00 per week. In a few weeks the other men employed there became aware of his former imprisonment, and refused to work unless the man was discharged. The poor fellow was thrown out of employment, though he had a wife to support. He could get no other employment, and had to steal; he was arrested and sent to the House of Correction for nine months. Shortly after his release from there, he committed another theft, and was sent back there again. He is now free, but where he is I know not.

These are only two cases. I could mention others, if necessary. It is time now that some earnest practical effort should be made to assist and reclaim discharged prisoners, by giving them sympathy and encouragement, and placing them where they will be surrounded with good influences. God help the discharged convict! The prison will have him no longer, and society refuses him. What shall he do?

Men and women, I charge you to be true to your nobler impulses, and not neglect your duty to unfortunate humanity. Do what you can to reclaim your fallen brother and sister from a life of crime and dishonor!

I hope this will be the means of enlisting the sympathy of some in behalf of our unfortunate criminals, and of inducing them to adopt some method to aid our discharged prisoners, and let them know that they are not entirely forsaken and forgotten.

J. H. C. ("JAMES BURNS.")

[Mr. Burns was not aware, when he wrote the above, that the State Agent is also Agent for the "Massachusetts Society for Aiding Discharged Convicts," receiving part of his salary from it. Of course, what he did was done partly on its behalf.—ED.]

THE CASE OF "JAMES BURNS."

April 1, 1874.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Sir,—While so much is being said in regard to prison discipline, allow me through your columns to give a little history of my experience in the Massachusetts State Prison, that the public may see the need of reformation among officers of that institution, as well as among the prisoners.

It is nearly five years since I commenced writing to a friendless young man, placed there for the term of ten years for stealing a harness valued at fifty dollars. Two years last December he wrote to me, requesting as a favor that I would write to a man there by the name of James Burns, as he had no one to write to him. I wrote, calling him brother, and strove in every way in my power to convince the man (for I then did not know whether he was young or old, or what the crime was for which he was imprisoned) that I was interested in him and his reformation, whatever his crime. I found my correspondent but a boy, and learned from his letters, which proved very interesting, that he was imprisoned when but fifteen years old; that the crime for which he was serving a five years' sentence he was innocent of, though he told me he had been bad enough, but was in this case only guilty of having a stolen watch found on his person. He had been taken with the two guilty ones into a court of justice (?) and, without time being allowed him to procure counsel, was tried, found guilty, and sentenced, in the space of a few hours. He went into prison smarting under the sense of a great injustice done him; he became, after a term of three years, so utterly disgusted and tired of his life that, feeling himself forsaken both by God and man, he planned suicide as a relief. Just at this time my letter reached him, and the poor boy was so overjoyed, as his reply plainly showed, that he made a solemn vow to live, and become a man, in the true sense of the word. I visited him at the prison, and saw and conversed with the Warden in relation to him; whose only complaint at first was that he was egotistic, and thought too much of himself.

For awhile all went smoothly with or between me and my correspondents. Finally a long letter of sixteen pages failed to reach my first correspondent. I learned this through one of the officers. I wrote the Warden to ascertain about it, and was told that no such letter had ever been received; but as I had heard that the clerk considered my letters "very peculiar," I did not think it strange that it "never had been received." In the letter I sent the Warden, I asked, if in the future I transgressed the rules of the institution in any manner, that he would have the offending letter returned to me with the odious sentiment marked, as my desire was to conform to prison regulations, and benefit, not injure, my young brothers there. I was, therefore, all the more surprised, the following spring, to learn that Burns was not receiving my letters. I called to see him, but could not, as he was on the "black list." I tried to learn what terrible thing he had done, but was told both by the Warden and his deputy (in a manner which I then thought implied that he was only a little fractious) that he was "inclined to be insolent;" "wanted to teach his superiors;" "had dared to write the Warden a letter of complaint;" and this was all I learned at this time. At this call I had not learned of the detention of my last letters. Soon I heard of it, wrote another letter enclosing it in one to the Warden himself, hoping thus that Burns might get it, but heard nothing from it. Three months afterwards I called at the prison, saw Burns, and learned from him that he was confined in "Solitary" for three days for writing the letter of manly complaint to the Warden. The Warden did not tell me that he punished him for it, but really made light of his failings, as I then thought; but I now see he did not care to talk about the punishment.

At this last visit, I had a long conversation with the Warden, which space will not permit me to relate. He gave me a letter which had been sent to me, and came back from the Dead Letter Office, stating "that my letters were withheld because I constantly referred to Burns' wrongs, which was a virtual admission that a great wrong had been committed in sending him to prison;" that "he, the companion of low thieves and pickpockets outside, under the influence of my letters, tried to come the high-toned sentimentalism, and get himself greatly excited on prison reform and reformation of prison officials, without expressing any remorse for his own crimes." He said my letters "were models of excellence in most respects, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred just the thing for a prisoner."

On the 24th of November, Burns' time in prison expired; and he came directly from prison to my home, clad in garments filthy, ragged, and poorly fitting. His sole wish seemed to be to benefit those he had left behind him in prison. He went to New York, but returned by request of a friend in a few weeks, to do what he could towards exposing certain wrongs in prison. For over seven weeks he was one of my family, and conducted himself in every way becoming a gentleman. He was accused by the Warden or his officers of being in the vicinity of the prison on several occasions, and of being seen signalling and heard shouting on Thursday, the 19th of February, the day previous to the escape of two prisoners; and it was suspected that he aided them to escape. After it was proven that Burns was at the State House at the time, he was still said to have been seen there, and for some time after no retraction was made by the Warden, or officer, of the false statement.

He recently visited the prison to consult with the Warden in regard to clothing, which was due him from the State. In presence of Inspectors Lewis and Hall, the clothing he had received already was denied to be that furnished him there, or the shirt and coat, the two wretched garments which he had worn from the prison to my home, and there removed. The shirt was so thoroughly worn out that it had to be washed with care to keep it from coming to pieces. It was patched, basted, and worn to lace-work. The coat was filthy, and badly worn, but the filth was the objectionable part, rendering it too offensive to retain it in the house. Now it is denied that these garments are the ones furnished him. My veracity has never before been called in question, nor the word of my parents set aside as worthless. Shall prisoners and those striving to aid them be insulted by the Warden, and no notice be taken of it? The Warden asks what the public has to do with him. I hope, for the good of prisoners suffering and dying daily, for the good of humanity generally, that the public will let the Warden know what it has to do with him. Too much depends upon the reformation of our prisoners to allow a man to continue at the head of an institution who rules by arbitrary authority, without natural refinement enough in his nature to discern the difference between a prisoner striving to be true to his higher nature, and a murderer, hypocrite, and saint, all in one.

In heaven's name, cannot something be done? Is justice dead? Shall the Warden shut from the institution those desirous of aiding the unfortunates there imprisoned? Shall he be permitted to withhold letters from prisoners, and attribute injurious results as a consequence of permitting them to be read, without delivering these letters up as proof that they contain nothing injurious? Is it gentlemanly, after he has been requested to return letters if not suitable for a prisoner, to retain them, and allow more than seven months to pass, after being politely asked to return them, before any notice is taken of the request? Have not citizens some rights as well as Wardens? I have asked him to give them to the Investigating Committee on Prisons, or to the Inspectors; but no reply ever has been made to such request.

I do not complain on my own account, but for the prisoners. If the Warden thus withholds letters in one case, he may in many more, and thus deprive prisoners of the only enjoyment they have.

Since writing the above, a note from the Warden has come to hand, in reply to a letter of mine, again requesting my letters to be returned or given to the Inspectors, and thus he replies: "To your request to return certain letters, it paines me deeply to be oblidge to decline." The matter will now go before the Inspectors; and I trust that something beneficial to the prisoners will be a result.

Truly yours, M. S. W.

SNOHOMISH CITY, Snohomish Co., }

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—You will probably be surprised to receive a letter from a place so far away in the great Northwest, and so little known and obscure as not to appear on any map yet published. Isolated as we are, the spirit of the age and true progress has found a home among our sparse population.

We have organized a public library association, incorporated under the name of Snohomish Athenæum, embracing literary exercises, lectures, recitations, etc. We have raised about $700.00, one-half paid in, and the balance coming in daily. Among the books in our library are Darwin's complete works, Agassiz, Lyell, Buckle, Hume, Herbert Spencer, and many others of a liberal type. Our people are very poor, but there is less superstition and cant in this community than I have ever met with elsewhere. We have no religious exercises at all of a sectarian character. The coming summer we intend to organize a Free Religious Association, on the plan recommended by THE INDEX.

We are very poor indeed, both as a society and as a community. Any of the liberal-minded in your community who have any tracts, pamphlets, or books they could donate to our society would be scattering seed in a soil all prepared to bringing forth fruits of advanced truth. We have a scientific department in connection with our Athenæum, and have already quite a little collection of curiosities. We should be glad to exchange specimens from our museum with those of other parts of the world. Any one desiring geological or botanical specimens from this part of the world, by writing to the "Corresponding Secretary of the Athenæum," and specifying the nature of specimens desired, will receive such by way of exchange. Any word you can say for us to friends of science, progress, and free thought will be gratefully remembered. I have donated THE INDEX to the library, and it is extensively read and much sought for.

With many assurances of respect and esteem, I have the honor to subscribe myself,

Yours to command, A. C. FOLSOM,
Cor. Sec. Snohomish Athenæum.

[The best way to show our interest and good-will seems to be to publish the above very interesting letter, and add the expression of a wish that its modest requests may be generously remembered by all who are able to help the Athenæum. It is one of the best signs of the times to see such institutions as this starting up spontaneously in the far West; and we would respectfully tender our congratulations and most cordial sympathies to its founders and friends. —ED.]

"SUFFICIENCY OF PRAYER."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

An article from the New York Independent, giving the religious standing of the leading literary and scientific people of the country, has been going the rounds of all the papers North and South, and to-day is taken up by the press of this city. Unitarians, Free Religionists, Congregationalists, Spiritualists, and Quakers, all get an honorable mention. I was surprised to find the name of Mark Twain among the Congregationalists, for an article of his on the subject of the "Sufficiency of Prayer," which appeared in our papers a few weeks ago, had given me the impression that he belonged with the "infidels" of our sad and back-slidden day and generation. I cut out the article at the time, and was on the point of sending it to a friend, but on second thought feared it might not be in all respects a fair test of the Tyndall "prayer-gauge;" and I also feared it might offend the innocent, and thus bring ceaseless visions of mill-stones hanging about my neck, and the depth of some bottomless sea to swallow me! Hence, I refrained. But now that Mr. Twain has been properly placed, it becomes a duty for me to present to the readers of THE INDEX a Congregationalist's testimony.

SUFFICIENCY OF PRAYER.

BY MARK TWAIN.

"Uncle Dan'l" (colored), aged forty; his wife, "Aunt Jinny," aged thirty; "young Miss" Emily Hawkins; "young Mars" Washington Hawkins, and "young Mars" Clay, the new member of the family, ranged themselves on a log after supper, and contemplated the marvellous river, and discussed it. The moon rose and sailed aloft through a maze of shredded cloud-wreaths, the sombre river just perceptibly brightened under the veil of light. A deep silence pervaded the air, and was emphasized at intervals, rather than broken, by the hooting of an owl, the baying of a dog, or the muffled crash of a caving bank in the distance. The little company assembled on the log were all children (at least in simplicity and broad and comprehensive ignorance), and the remarks they made about the river were in keeping with the character, and so awed were they by the grandeur and the solemnity of the scene before them, and by their belief that the air was filled with invisible spirits, and that the faint zephyrs were caused by their passing wings, that all their talk took to itself a tinge of the supernatural, and their voices were subdued to a low and reverent tone. Suddenly Uncle Dan'l exclaimed:—

"Chil'en, dah's sumfin a comin!"

All crowded close together, and every heart beat faster. Uncle Dan'l pointed down the river with his bony finger.

A deep coughing sound troubled the stillness, way toward a wooded cape that jutted into the stream a mile distant. All in an instant a fierce eye of fire shot out from behind the cape and s nt a long brilliant pathway quivering athwart the dusky water. The coughing grew louder and louder, the glaring eye grew larger and still larger, glared wilder and still wilder. A huge shape developed itself out of the gloom, and from its tall duplicate horns dense volumes of smoke, and spangled with sparks, poured out and went tumbling away into the further darkness. Nearer and nearer the thing came, till its long sides began to glow with spots of light which mirrored themselves in the river and attended the monster like a torch-light procession.

"What is it! Oh, what is it, Uncle Dan'l?"

With a deep solemnity the answer came:—

"It's de Almighty! Git down on yo' knees!"

It was not necessary to say it twice. They were all kneeling in a moment. And then, while the mysterious coughing rose stronger and stronger, and the threatening glare reached farther and wider, the negro's voice lifted up its supplications:—

"Oh Lord, we's ben mighty wicked, an' we knows dat we 'zerve to go to de bad place, but, good Lord, deah Lord, we ain't ready yit, we ain't ready—let dese po' chil'en hab one mo' chance, jes' one mo chance. Take de ole niggah if you's got to hab somebody. Good Lord, good deah Lord, we don't know whah you's a gwine to, we don't know who you's got yo' eye on, but we knows by de way you's a comin', we knows by de way you's a tiltin' along in yo' chryot o' fiah dat some po' sinner's gwine to ketch it. But good Lord, dese chil'en don't b'long heah, dey's f'm Obedstown, whah dey don't know nuffin', and you knows, yo' own sef, dat dey ain't 'sponsible. An' deah Lord, good Lord, it ain't like yo' mercy, it ain't like yo' pity, it ain't like yo' long sufferin', lovin' kindness for to take dis kind o' 'vantage o' sich little chil'n as dese is when dey's so many ornery grown folks chuck full o' cussedness dat wants roastin down dah. Oh Lord, spah de little chil'en, don't tar de little chil'en away f'm dey frens, jes' let 'em off jes' dis once, and take it out'n de ole niggah. Heah I is, Lord, heah I is! De old niggah's ready, Lord, de ole—"

The flaming and churning steamer was right abreast of the party, and not twenty steps away. The awful thunder of a mud-valve suddenly burst forth, drowning the prayer, and as suddenly Uncle Dan'l snatched a child under each arm and scoured into the woods with the rest of the pack at his heels, and then, ashamed of himself, he halted in the deep darkness and shouted, but rather feebly: "Heah I is, Lord, heah I is!" There was a moment of throbbing suspense, and then to the surprise and comfort of the party it was plain that the august presence had gone by, for its dreadful noises were receding. Uncle Dan'l headed a cautious reconnoisance in the direction of the log. Sure enough, the Lord was just turning a point a short distance up the river, and while they looked the lights winked out and the coughing diminished by degrees, and presently ceased altogether.

"H'wsh! Well, dere's some folks say dey ain't no 'ficiency in prah. Dis child would like to know wha'h we'd a ben now if it warn't fo' dat prah. Dat's it, dat's it."

"PROHIBITING" BIBLE-READING.

FILLMORE, N.Y., March 7, 1874.

MR. ABBOT:—

In talking with an Orthodox clergyman, I found that he objected to the fourth "Demand of Liberalism" that it is intolerant, in that it would forbid the use of the Bible in schools as a reading book by those who believe in it. He thought liberals ought to go no farther than to prohibit those being compelled to use it who do not believe in it.

I see by THE INDEX (present volume, page 66) that a mass meeting of the citizens of Vineland, N. J., has adopted the following preamble: "Whereas, We believe that the enforced use of the Bible, or any other book, in the public schools, as a religious exercise, is contrary to the principles of religious freedom, therefore, Resolved," etc. Please explain why liberals should ask any more than the citizens of Vineland asked.

I do not believe you would be willing to enact an intolerant statute.

Yours in the cause of liberalism, G. W. T.

[To prohibit Bible-reading in general would most certainly be intolerant. But to prohibit it in schools which all tax-payers must support is not intolerance. No person has a right to force his private religion into a public institution; and Bible-reading (as a religious exercise) in our public schools is a direct violation of equal rights. The "Demands of Liberalism" are as intolerant as equity and justice, and no more so.—ED.]

RABBITS AND GHOSTS.

At a debating society somewhere in Missouri, the question for the night was, "Is there such a thing as experimental religion?"

Various arguments were brought forward on both sides, when one of the debaters on the affirmation arose, with the air of one about to convince the world, and very deliberately said that he knew there was such a thing as experimental religion, because he had felt it here (laying his hand where his heart was supposed to be). Of course that was unanswerable. But after a time sufficient for the audience to breathe freely again, one of the invincibles of the opposition arose, and said he had had no religious experience, but he believed in ghosts. He had always been taught to believe in ghosts, and, when he was going through the woods of a dark night, and a rabbit jumped up, he knew it was a ghost, for he felt it here (laying his hand with a ludicrous seriousness on his heart).

ST. JOSEPH, MO.

JACK, who is at boarding-school in the country, writes home: "Please send me a good trap to catch a woodchuck, and a piece of carpet for me to say my prayers on."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. I vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to Form a Liberal League,

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

MR. SUMNER'S last book, Prophetic Voices Concerning America, is being published by Lee & Shepard.

M. GUIZOT, of France, is in his eighty-eighth year. He has recently finished his History of France, and is just commencing his Universal History.

THE Investigator has reached its forty-fourth volume, and Mr. Seaver, its editor, the thirty-seventh year of his editorial life. Both have our heartiest congratulations and good wishes.

BAYARD TAYLOR speaks of Egypt (where he now is) as "a country, which, once seen, forever after attracts." We understand that Mr. Emerson did not find himself of the same opinion when he was there last; but was glad to get away from the land of the Sphinx.

WE ARE INFORMED, on the best authority, that Mr. Emerson, as one of the Overseers of Harvard College, did vote for Compulsory Prayers at that institution. The truth must be told, whether we like it or not. Yet we can but think that this vote was inconsistent with the whole drift of his former life and teachings.

THERE ARE to be some private theatricals, for the benefit of the Free Religious Association, at the Hall of the Christian Union, No. 300 Washington Street, to-morrow (Friday) evening, at a quarter before eight o'clock. Tickets can be had at Ditson's, 255 Washington Street. We hope the entertainment will receive excellent patronage from the friends of the Free Religious Association.

AT A SPECIAL meeting of the Second Radical Club, at the house of Rev. Dr. Bartol, Monday evening, April 20, when Dr. Bartol read a wonderfully interesting and beautiful essay on Shakspeare, Mrs. Dall stated that there is in this city, at the present time, a portrait of Shakspeare, which was painted during his life. The picture, we believe, is the property of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society.

A VERY handsome picture of Charles Sumner has been published by J. H. Bufford's Sons, 490 Washington Street. It is a copy of a recent photograph by Black, and is a satisfactory likeness of the great senator as he appeared in the late period of his life. R. Thayer, 18 1-2 Boylston Street, is the general agent for its sale; but any reader of THE INDEX can, if he chooses, procure it by sending to this office, and it will be forwarded to him by mail. The price of the picture is seventy-five cents.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON has written a letter accepting the candidacy for the office of Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, Scotland. It is addressed to the Committee formed to promote his election to that office. He says: "If you persist, you are at liberty to propose my name; and, if elected, I shall certainly endeavor to meet your wishes and those of the University, as to the time and the duties which the office shall require." We suppose that the principal duty of my Lord Rector is to deliver an inaugural address setting forth his views on Education.

PUBLIC OPINION in favor of cremation instead of inhumation of the dead appears to be making some progress both in this country and Europe. Early in this month, a meeting was held in New York for the purpose of organizing a Cremation Society. Several prominent gentlemen were present, and letters were read from O. B. Frothingham, C. A. Dana, and others. Some very good arguments were brought forward on this occasion to prove that burning the bodies of the dead is a better practice every way than that of ordinary burial. As the result of the meeting, a bill has been introduced in the New York legislature to incorporate the Cremation Society then provided for.

A WRITER in the Brooklyn Argus says: "The actor and the actress are among the hardest-worked people on this two-penny little footstool which men call the earth—and very often they are the poorest paid in proportion to the work they do. Yet they are, as a rule, very jolly folk." We believe there is a most unjust prejudice on the part of society in regard to theatrical people generally. So far as our acquaintance with them goes, they have as many virtues and as few vices as the common run of men and women. Their vocation is as legitimate as any other; for it is just as necessary to amuse and entertain people as to feed, clothe, and instruct them. And it is even possible sometimes to get as good a lesson from the stage as from the pulpit.

A NEW monthly paper, called Equity, has made its appearance in Boston, for the first time, this month. It declares itself to be "a journal of Christian Labor Reform," its aim being "to point out the way to real Equity." Its editor—Rev. Jesse H. Jones, a man of ability and devotedness—writes a frank, manly, vigorous opening article for his paper, in which he thoroughly commits himself to all the interests involved in the Labor Reform movement, but distinctly states that he shall work under the Christian banner and by distinctively Christian methods. "We build," he says, "on man and God, by faith in the power of Jesus Christ." We certainly do not withhold from him our sincerest wish that he may succeed in doing all possible good in the peculiar way that he has chosen. His little eight-paged paper makes a most neat and presentable appearance, and we have no doubt will be well worth the dollar a year which he asks for it. The New England News Company have it for sale.

THE SECOND RADICAL CLUB had one of its most interesting meetings last Monday evening. Having, on previous occasions, heard the story of an ex-convict, indeed, of two ex-convicts, of their experience of State-prison life, and their statements as to the discipline at present enforced in the Charlestown prison,—all which had awakened the deep sympathies and the keen interest of many of its members,—the Club, with that fairness which, we hope, is characteristic of all radicals, determined to hear both sides of the case before judging; and therefore they invited General Chamberlain, the present Warden of the State Prison, to visit them, and give his version of the whole matter. An unusually large meeting welcomed the General, and gave him the most careful and respectful hearing. The impression which he made upon the members of the Club, we think, was generally a quite favorable one. While he himself does not claim to be infallible in his official capacity, and while it is evident to us that he has made some mistakes in his administrative theory and practice, at the same time we cannot resist the conviction that the present Warden is a man who means faithfully to do his duty in whatever position he occupies, and that his motives are excellent and honorable. The system of prison discipline which he is expected to enforce is more to be blamed than is he; and to reform or change that should be rather our purpose than to find fault with the Warden. It ought here to be said that the two ex-convicts, to whose statements General Chamberlain was in part replying, were present at the meeting, and in their replies bore themselves with great modesty and dignity; and we think that the result of the meeting is an undiminished confidence, on the part of a great majority of the members of the Club, in the substantial veracity and integrity of these two gentlemen, inasmuch as the statement of the Warden was in most particulars corroborative of their previous statements.

What is Free Religion?

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF PROVIDENCE, R. I., AT THEIR FIRST MEETING, FEBRUARY 22, 1874.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

Every person, institution, idea, or thought which comes into the world, and attains any degree of prominence among intelligent people, is confronted with a challenge of inquiry as to what it is, and what it means. "Who goes there?" says the sentinel on duty, to every individual coming into relation with the military position: "advance and give the countersign!"—let us know whether you be friend or foe; whether you mean us well or ill! So it is society's privilege and duty to inquire of everything which comes into relation with it, "What is your nature, and what is your purpose? Do you propose welfare, or do you propose detriment?" Whoever or whatever cannot meet this challenge, and, after due examination and trial, give satisfactory account of itself, is rightfully subject to arrest and rejection.

Somewhat recently, a little company of thoughtful, earnest men and women have brought forward to the notice of the world what they call "Free Religion," which they propose to offer in the place of what has gone before, and to endeavor to establish in the minds and hearts of the people. It is therefore exceedingly proper that the world should inquire, "What is Free Religion? What does it stand for; what does it signify?" And none are so anxious that this inquiry should be made—made searchingly and thoroughly—as this same little company who already believe in Free Religion. As one of this company, speaking for nobody but myself, I propose to give my definition or explanation of Free Religion. I simply propose to tell why I believe in it.

Words are often very inadequate vehicles of thought, and yet when words are used by careful and discriminating persons they mean a great deal; in fact, they sometimes mean exactly what they say. I think that those who have lately, in this country, inaugurated a somewhat new departure in thought and discussion upon religion, were most happy in the name which they chose to give distinction to their movement. This new thing which they proposed to offer to the world, they called "Free Religion." I hail the felicitous title! It suggests the two grandest ideas which the human mind has ever conceived and entertained; the two ideas which have been the inspiration of man's head and heart through all time. FREEDOM and RELIGION! History has been written to describe the progress of these two great ideas. But for them, the pen of the historian would have lacked its golden point, and his page have failed to instruct and thrill. But for them, man would still be the barbarous being which he was when he first appeared on this planet, and no halo of civilization would now crown his uplifted head. His whole long, stumbling, struggling career has been an endeavor to get a better statement and a better experience of freedom and religion; and in proportion as he has realized his dreams of these he has advanced from the lowest animalism into the stature and semblance of humanity. In his effort to apply these to his own state, the possibility of society first dawned upon him; and no true society can exist until these are relieved of every trammel and alloy, and firmly established in the intellect and conscience, and thoroughly incorporated into the character, of every individual.

Those who originated the Free Religious movement, therefore, but opened a new chapter, or turned a new leaf, in the history of the race. They did not cut themselves off from the past, but placed themselves in the line of its progress—looking forward, not backward. The very name which they chose—Free Religion—linked them with all that had gone before, with all the effort and the struggle which humanity had made to gain a fuller freedom and a purer religion.

I have to say, then, that all that Free Religion means, and exactly what it means, is FREE RELIGION. The very marrow of its significance is found in its very name. In the fulness and the exigency of time it has come to lay its emphasis on, first, freedom; second, religion. And the emphasis which it brings is greater and grander than any which has been laid on either of these two words before. To show that this is so, and that Free Religion has a mission in the order of the natural evolution of ideas, we must look at the past.

I. FREEDOM.

Freedom never yet has had full birth in Christianity. I do not believe it ever can have. Christianity is not its natural mother. By her very constitution and temperament, she was evidently never designed to bear such a deep-chested, broad-shouldered, high-browed, and clear-eyed offspring. She has been in pains of labor with him for eighteen centuries; but she has never fairly delivered him. And she cannot do so without dying; her throes of labor must end in throes of death. Her breasts never can feed the child Freedom with the milk which he needs to grow his lusty life. Her home is too small to give scope to his expanding powers. She has tried it, and she has failed. She has brought up many fine and beautiful offspring, but not one of them has turned out to be Freedom himself; only a race have they been which preceded his birth, while he waited for the hour which should give him real existence.

Jesus of Nazareth was a noble soul. He was a splendid religious genius. He towers high and eminent among all the glorious men of the past. The world has not done with him yet. It never can have done with him; for all the words of truth he spoke are immortal, and they will live in the memories and glow in the hearts of men forever. And Jesus was better than is the Church which goes by his name; he was broader, deeper, grander, sweeter, more charitable and more liberal every way. He ought not to be held responsible for all the narrowness and bigotry and intolerance which the great body of his disciples have always shown; for could he have reappeared in any of the centuries after his Church had got well established, even no wiser and no better than when he died, we believe he would have severely rebuked it for much of its spirit and many of its deeds.

But Jesus' own heart was better than his head. His intuitions were nobler than his judgments; his moral sense was wiser than his intellect; his sympathies were broader than his belief. He had love enough in his soul to have made him a universalist; but he had narrowness enough in his understanding to make him a specialist. He was a sectarian, though his sectarianism was not of the heart, but rather of the head; it was not so much a personal as it was a national characteristic in him. As a lover of humanity, an inspirer of holiness, and a benefactor in his day and generation, Jesus is almost unapproachable; but as a teacher, he often comes far short of being wise. In this latter capacity, it cannot be denied that he did at least plant the seeds of the arrogance, dogmatism, and intolerance which have been ever conspicuous in the Christian Church. That principle of authority which the Church has always insisted upon, and which has always been the bitter foe of freedom, we may fairly lay at the door of Jesus; its germs can be clearly discovered in some of his teachings. "Christ is the authoritative, specially divine teacher," says the Church; and Christ himself seems scarcely to make any more modest claim. As he grew older in life, and especially older in his public career, his self-consciousness seemed to grow upon him; he more and more swelled with the conviction of a particular, providential destiny. We find him inviting too much attention to himself, setting himself forth too much as a necessary mediator and savior, laying too great stress on faith and belief in him, and discipleship of him. "Come unto me," he says—"follow me"—"believe in me"—"abide in me"—"ask in my name"—"without me ye can do nothing"—"I am the vine, ye are the branches"—"he that believeth in me shall never die"—"the Father loveth you because ye have loved me"—"I go to prepare a place for you." All this is sublime, but irrational and unjustifiable, egotism—an egotism entirely inharmonious with the law of mental and spiritual liberty; with the truth, not as it is in Jesus, but as it is in each aspiring, independent individual. And then, although Jesus charges his disciples to go and "preach the gospel to all the world," yet he tells them to preach and to baptize in his name; and winds up by saying, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned,"—which saying contains the very essence of dogmatism, narrowness, and bigotry, and furnishes the amplest excuse for all the cruel, persecuting zeal which his disciples in all ages have manifested for him.

In my opinion, it is incontrovertible that the didactic Christianity of Christ is not favorable to personal freedom of thought and action. His Christianity means authority, not of the individual mind and conscience, but of the Christ and his Church. Jesus was a noble protestant against the juiceless formalism of Judaism; but in turn he became—unintentionally, perhaps, but really—a dogmatist in the interest of Christianity. The New Testament does not conspicuously cultivate manly self-reliance, vigorous independence, virile exercises in mental and spiritual freedom; but rather a constant looking to and dependence upon Jesus, as the indispensable and all-sufficient mediator, teacher, and savior.

Inasmuch as Christianity in its origin was not favorable to freedom in religion,—inasmuch as its revered founder announced himself as the great Master whose words alone are saving truth and life,—it is to be expected that the Christian Church, if faithful to the "author and finisher" of its faith, should have followed out the logical line of his instructions, and laid claim to an authority in his name, which was a denial of the right of private judgment, and an extinguisher of the growth of free thought. This is exactly what it did. The Christian Church, as soon as it got established, proved itself to be the unhesitating and uncompromising foe of mental freedom. Christianity annexed the State to the Church, and used the tremendous power of both to subject the individual, and absolutely to control his faith and his conduct. There really was no freedom in the Church for centuries; the rule of authority excluded personal independence. Every free tongue was bound, every free voice was hushed; the ecclesiastical mandate was supreme. The "dark ages" indeed prevailed, because the sun of freedom was eclipsed by the opaque body of Christ's Church. Civilization halted, and seemed about to turn and leave the Christian world; for liberty is the soul of civilization, and when liberty is suppressed progress is prevented.

This was Catholic Christianity. Do you say that Protestant Christianity was different? I contend that it was not essentially different. The Christian claim of authority was not surrendered by Protestantism. That claim was pushed just as vigorously after Luther's famous protest as it was before; and Luther himself pushed it as energetically as did ever the Pope. Luther and the Pope agreed as to the authority itself, and the ultimate source of it. Christ was the absolute Master of both; he was the "very God manifest in the flesh," to whom each equally bowed. Their only quarrel was as to who or what should represent that authority. The Pope said he represented it. Luther said the Bible represented it. This was the pith of their contention. They quarrelled, not about a principle, but about an office.

Now it is this assumption of an authority external to the individual, which makes Christianity the foe of freedom. No matter what that authority is, nor what is chosen to represent it; if the private judgment must yield to it, if the reason and the conscience of the individual must be subject to it, then mental liberty is denied, and free thought is put to death. Martin Luther never dreamed of denying this authority—the authority of Christ as represented by the Bible. These are his words: "Unless I be convinced by Scripture and reason, I neither can nor dare retract anything; for my conscience is a captive to God's Word, and it is neither safe nor right to go against conscience. There I take my stand. I can do no otherwise. So help me God. Amen." Brave words they were for him, under the circumstances; and we will honor him for them. But they were not brave enough. "My conscience is a captive to God's Word," he said. If the conscience is captive to anything, it is not free; and a free conscience is absolutely essential to make a free man—it is the indispensable condition of seeking and knowing the truth. The conscience of Protestantism is captive to the Bible; and therefore the Protestant conscience is not free. History abundantly proves this. It proves that the office of representing Christ's authority was only transferred, by the Lutheran Reformation, from the Pope to the Bible. The right of private judgment still continued to be denied; reason was still enslaved, and conscience struggled to be free. All who, like Descartes, dared to exercise mental freedom, and think independently of the Church's dogmas, had to break with the still asserted authority of Christianity, and go out into the wide field of personal independence. They were heretics to the Church, and were compelled to suffer her severest displeasure.

But shall I be told that another form of Christianity remains to be considered, and that this is favorable to freedom? I know that the gradual progress from authority to liberty produced what is called "Liberal Christianity," and that this claims to be a real assertion of the right of private judgment, a guaranty of free thought and reason in religion. I wish I had found it to be so! If I had, I should have been saved the great pain of parting from the faith of my fathers, and wresting my individuality from that form of Christianity in which I was born and nurtured. A loving and sensitive man does not wantonly break ties that bind him to tender memories and dear associations. None but a fool will offend his friends without cause, and turn his back on the hopes he had cherished, and forsake the work to which he had dedicated himself in his enthusiastic youth. If some had found "Liberal Christianity" all that it pretends to be—the home of free thought and rational religion—they certainly would be among its devoted ministers to-day. But disappointment touched their hearts, when the free word of God that was glowing there rose to their lips and essayed full utterance. That word, because it was free—because it was not the word of tradition, or custom, or formalism—found no hospitality among "Liberal Christians," but came back to the speakers tortured, distorted, and bewrayed, accompanied with looks of surprise and words of indignation.

No; Liberal Christianity was a beautiful dream, but it is not a beautiful reality. At best, it is only Liberal Christianity; not Liberal Religion. The old Christianity is there, with the authoritative Christ, and the semi-authoritative Bible. It is only liberty within Christianity; and Christianity never has meant liberty, and it never can mean liberty. The acknowledgment of Christ as Master—that is, Master in any absolute or specially divine sense—is a stab at freedom in its vital part. The great, orthodox leaders of "Liberal Christianity," dead and living, have uttered many noble words, for which they should be everlastingly revered; but not one of them has ever uttered any word in favor of a liberty larger than Christianity, or inconsistent with the acknowledgment of Christ as an authoritative and specially divine teacher of religious truth. "Liberal Christianity" is a sect. It has always been a sect; it has always acted as a sect. It has never encouraged free thought but within Christian limits. Behold how it treated Theodore Parker; and he lived when "Liberal Christianity" was comparatively young, and when it had as much enthusiasm for liberality as it ever has had. Mr. Parker, because of his free thought and reason in religion, because he dared to think and speak without stopping to consider what effect his thinking and speaking would have upon distinctively Christian doctrines, was an offence to "Liberal Christians;" he was a heretic in their eyes, and was dealt with by them accordingly. The "Boston Association of Ministers" condemned him. Prominent clergymen in the Unitarian denomination would not speak to him in the street, nor sit on the same sofa or bench with him. Those of them who dared to exchange pulpits with him were themselves thrust out of pulpits, or had their societies rent asunder. Theological students in "Liberal Christian" Divinity Schools were warned against his "dangerous" doctrines; and the venerable President of one of these schools said, with threatening finger pointed at a student suspected of leaning to Mr. Parker's views: "We must crush out this Parkerism!"

Did all this signify liberality? It signified "Liberal Christianity," but it did not signify Liberal Religion. "Liberal Christianity" did as well as it could; it could not have done better and been true to its Christian name and traditions. I do not blame it; I only recall history, and re-state facts. "Liberal Christianity" did as well then as it has done since, or is doing now. It has got the "Lord Jesus" enthroned in the preamble to the Constitution of its National Conference; and nobody is in favor in its ranks, who does not bow, or at least nod, to that name as he passes. And, just now, in entire consistency with all their sectarian history, "Liberal Christians" are beginning to excommunicate those who will not excommunicate themselves. They are dropping from their list the names of men, against whom no charge of misconduct is brought, but who only decline to call themselves Christians. Be it so. It is in accordance with the fitness of things. As one of the excommunicated, I make no complaint. I recognize the logical and historical fact that my free religious views put me outside of any Christian sect however liberal. I reverence the Christian name, because I reverence him on account of whom it came. Its memory is fragrant to me, and always will be. But I do not accept what it doctrinally signifies, nor believe in what it distinctively implies.

In the light of the history which we have hastily scanned, I repeat now what I said before, that Christianity is not favorable to freedom. Freedom struggles away from Christianity, not towards it. All that is good in Christianity freedom and Free Religion will perpetuate. But the free faith of the future cannot bear the Christian name or the Christian tradition. Free Religion comes, because Christianity is inadequate to meet the demands of free thought. It comes to emphasize what Christianity has failed to emphasize; namely, FREEDOM. It comes to reconcile freedom with religion. It comes to prove that free thought in any and every direction, independent of the authority of Christ and Church and Bible, is consistent with and demanded by the religious nature and religious development of man. For one, I should believe in Free Religion if it did no more than simply to stand for freedom; because I see that freedom is so essential to the progress of humanity in everything that is good, and because I see how freedom has been snubbed and hurt and hindered by that greatest of all the world religions—Christianity. Without freedom Science could not prosper; and Science is one of the greatest lights, helps, and hopes of man. Christianity has never favored Science, because Science has never favored Christianity; it simply could not—each is antagonistic to the other. But Free Religion and Science are harmonious; each believes in the other, and their great destinies are in common.

Free Religion, then, stands for freedom; such freedom as man has never known but only dreamed of. A freedom which shall give scope to all his wonderful powers and faculties; which shall enable him to seek wisdom among things old and new, and to gather in from every quarter the precious thoughts, sentiments, and experiences of his race; which shall set him face towards Truth, with untrammelled mind to search for her and to declare her glorious secrets, as from time to time they shall be revealed to his patient hand and brain.

II. RELIGION.

But Free Religion stands for religion no less than for freedom. It is not only Free Religion, but it is Free Religion. It demands freedom first, because freedom is an essential condition and method wherein and whereby everything good in thought and life is reached; but it believes in and hopes for pure religion as the end and crown of all.

The word religion has got itself fastened into our language. I do not think it ever can be thrown out. It has not, like the word Christianity, a chiefly historical and doctrinal significance; but, on the contrary, the word religion has a deeply human and spiritual significance. It stands for universal experiences. The thing itself is human. It is in and of humanity. It crops out with human nature even in barbarism—grotesque and unseemly, indeed, and yet full of promise. Civilization does not destroy religion, any more than it destroys human nature; but with human nature religion is developed and made more pure and true by civilization.

I say that for this pure religion Free Religion hopes. We have not had pure religion yet, simply because we have not had free religion. We have had religion, in many forms, ever since we have had man; but we have had it mixed with superstition. Christianity has never given us pure religion, because it has never believed in and used the method of freedom. It has given us many truly religious men and women, as indeed has every other great world religion; but Christianity, as a system, an institution, a Church, has never produced or taught religion pure and simple. It has given us a theology, a Christology, an eschatology, an idolatry, and a morality; but I undertake to say, speaking historically and logically, that it has never given and never can give us pure religion.

In this direction, also, Christianity has done as well as it could. Under the circumstances, I find no fault with it; I only point out its failing. But Christianity started wrong; and therefore it has proceeded wrong, and come out wrong. Jesus himself, essentially, was a purely religious man; and if he had not, in the end, got his religion mixed up with his notions of his own Messiahship, he might have been the man to have prophesied the beautiful and pure religion for all time. But, as it was, he gave himself to his disciples rather than his religion; and they made the mistake of accepting the gift, and going out to preach "Christ and him crucified" instead of the simple truths of pure religion. The result is that, in the Christian world to-day, we have an idolatry of Christ rather than a pure worship of God; we have an observing of forms, a handling of sacraments, in the name of Christ, rather than a truly human faith in a truly human religion.

All these Christian forms and sacraments, I allow, have some good meaning in them, and produce some good effect; and the better and more truly religious the man who administers or observes them, the deeper is their meaning, and the more beneficial their effect. But as fixed and instituted rites, invariably performed on the authority and in the name of Christ, they mislead the mind from the latent meaning to the patent symbol, and eclipse truth by error, and substance by show. I speak from experience no less than from observation. I have been a devout observer of these Christian rites; and, honest as was my thought in observing them, I know that they did, by their stated and inappropriate and authoritative recurrence, dull the edge of my finest enthusiasm, and retard the flow of my deepest feeling. And when at last, as a minister of a Christian church, I sought some relief from the incubus of form that was weighing me down, by proposing some changes in the ordinary observance of the "Lord's Supper,"—such as dispensing with the bread and wine, and sometimes substituting the invariable mention of Jesus with a reference to some other great departed soul,—my proposition was received by the most Christian of my congregation with horror; and they said: "Away with him! for he has given up Christ, and refused the Christian communion!" Without knowing it, they had made their Christ and his symbols an idol, and were as really worshipping a fetich as did any heathen who ever bowed the knee to "stock or stone." They were so blinded by their venerable idolatry, that they could not see that my suggestion was made in the interest of a purer worship and a deeper communion.

Our Christian churches, to-day, are full of this same idolatry of a man and his memorials. It is not religion, pure and simple, which is found there, but Christianity; and Christianity largely means superstition and idol worship. It is a religion of profession and form, and ceremony and show. It is a religion "for Christ's sake," not for man's; it is a religion which commemorates the Savior, not one that celebrates the saved. I would do no injustice to any truly religious men and women who are devout Christians. I know there are many of them, and have been many of them. I speak of systems and institutions, not private persons. But in proportion as a man is truly religious he ceases to be distinctively a Christian. Both history and logic prove this. The most truly religious men and women in the Church have not been those whom the Church has most honored; often they have been those whom it has most dishonored and persecuted. No finer saints ever lived than Fénelon and Madame Guyon; and both were in disgrace with the Church. Was not Theodore Parker saintly? He was so pious that he found the "Liberal Christians" cold and undevout; and they found his religion unchristian! When a man becomes purely religious, his natural tendency is to pass out from dogmas, to disuse instituted forms, to disrespect official persons, and to grow in love with the free spirit and the wide, large fellowship of souls. His church then ceases to be the "Church of Christ," and becomes the Church of Humanity.

It is to emphasize religion, therefore, that Free Religion appears. It comes to emancipate religion from superstition; to free it from dogma and formalism and personal leadership. It comes to establish a free spiritual fellowship; to prophesy and work for the Universal Church of All Souls. I wish it might not be thought or said by anybody, that Free Religion means only freedom, and that it intends to dispense with religion altogether. As I understand it, it means and proposes no such thing. Religion cannot be dispensed with. Superstition may; idolatry may; dogmatism may; formalism may. But religion is not any one of these, nor all of them. Religion is the flowering out of the finest possibilities of humanity; it is the highest culture of all the powers of man; it is the desire and the effort of the individual to realize the Best which his mind conceives, and his heart imagines; it is the poise and aim of the whole being towards the Ideal that forever allures and attracts it. Can you dispense with all this? You must dispense with man first! Religion is the purest poetry and the truest romance of life; it is the passionate, blushing love of the soul for all that is true and beautiful and good; it is the spirit of enthusiasm in youth, and the thrill of inspiration in maturity; it is the hope, the dream, the omen of "a better time coming" for boy and man, for girl and woman, for poor and rich, for low and high, for slave and freeman, for ignorant and wise, for bad and good. Will you fling away all this? Then fling away human nature; let ruin come on civilization, and man relapse into the animal!

For one, as a believer in Free Religion, I am not ashamed to say that I still persevere to have faith in God and hope of immortality. I know no reason why I should not do so. Others may, and therefore they will do differently. But these two beliefs yet remain to me the best and most probable explanation, not only of my own life, but of the universe; they are elements in, if not the basis of, my own religion. But I believe in God so much that I wish to say very little about him. I decline to be called on to tell what I believe in regard to him, though I ought to be willing always to try to tell why I believe in him. I have no description to make of him, and scarcely any name to give to him; yet to me he is a reality, and the Reality of realities. I do not hesitate, at times, to lift up the heart and voice of aspiration to him, and to say, "O Thou!" But my confidence in him, as the Great Friendliness of the universe, is so mighty and constant, that I could not think of begging him to do this or that for me, when I feel sure that the best is always being done for all.

Now, so far as my experience goes, Free Religion cultivates such a faith as this in God. It is not, however, my privilege to speak for others in this matter. Some who believe in Free Religion call themselves "atheists" and "materialists." I do not call them so; they may be. And yet, because they decline to call the power in the universe God, but only call it Power, Force, Law, or Eternal Substance, I know not why the name "atheist" or "materialist" should fall on them. At any rate, I know so much as this—that their speculative atheism and materialism do not seem so bad, or so dangerous, or so unreligious, to me, as do the practical atheism and materialism which I see among Christians. I would rather a man should think materialism than be material. It is far safer that our thought should be materialistic than that our life should. Many of these Free Religious atheists and materialists are what I should call religious men; they are devoted to truth and devoted to goodness; the look of their life is upward, not downward; their tendency is forward, not backward. Free Religion does not spoil men for being religious, nor does it make them unreligious; on the contrary, if it takes hold of them deeply,—if it affects not only their thought, but their feeling and their life as well,—it tones them up throughout, making them more earnest in purpose, more faithful in action, and more reverent towards all the wonders and mysteries of the world of matter and of man. The effect of freedom, on a true man, is itself religious. The thought that he is free to think, irresponsible to church, or sect, or party; that he is free to follow the truth wherever it leads, and that no "damnation" waits for him if he makes a mistake,—this thought fills him with the highest sense of responsibility; it puts new lustre in his eye, and a new, sweet joy in his heart.

I say, then, all hail to FREE RELIGION, which stands equally for freedom and for religion,—a larger freedom and a purer religion than the world has ever seen! May its altar rise in every heart and mind! May its truths invite all of every race and clime; may its fellowship of the spirit include all of every faith and creed; and may at last its more beautiful worship and its nobler service fill and bless the whole world!

JOSIAH WARREN'S LAST LETTER.

[As our readers have been already informed, Mr. Josiah Warren, the author of True Civilization and other unpretentious little works on social reform, died in Charlestown, Massachusetts, on the fourteenth of April, at the age of seventy-five years. Although he was confined to his chamber during most of the winter, his mind was as vigorous as ever; and he took great interest in the articles on his "cost principle" which have been published from time to time in THE INDEX. On the eleventh of April, he wrote the first of the following papers; but, not being satisfied with it, he essayed without entire success to re-write it on the thirteenth, the very day before he died, even calling upon an attendant to steady his hand while writing. There is something exceedingly touching in this unquenchable enthusiasm for his idea manifested by the good old man, while the flame of life was flickering in its socket; and, notwithstanding the repetitions, it seems well to publish both drafts of his paper together, that his latest thought on the subject to which he had devoted his entire life may be preserved entire. Under these circumstances we refrain from making the comments that suggest themselves by way of rejoinder to his criticisms.—ED.]

[For THE INDEX.]

MR. ABBOT:—In THE INDEX of the 5th of March, I see that, in treating of the "cost principle," you do not grasp the whole significance of it, but confine it to money, the compensation for labor, while we are continually reiterating that the word cost is used on account of its convenience to express sacrifices of all kinds, whether physical or mental.

You instance two men: one finds a brickbat, and the other picks up a diamond. You say that the cost principle requires that, the labor being the same, the one should exchange his diamond for the other's brickbat; entirely ignoring that the cost principle justifies him in demanding compensation, not only for the sacrifice of time and ease in picking up the jewel, but for the sacrifice made in parting with it.

You do great injustice to the subject, too, when you imply that the cost principle requires any one to buy anything (like the brickbat) that is of no value to him: you seem to think that, because one accepts a principle, he is bound to accept any absurd application that any one chooses to make of it, however it may be distorted. But the natural sovereignty of each person will take care of this.

I had thought of saying something about interest on money; but, as I approach the subject, I find it gathering such a cloud of childish sophisms to unravel, I can only laugh at them, and say we shall accomplish nothing, unless we make money what it ought to be; and if we do this, there will be nothing to be done in borrowing and lending money. Nothing to say about interest. JOSIAH WARREN.

I am too sick to write plainly.

[For THE INDEX.]

MR. ABBOT:—In THE INDEX of the 5th of March, I see that, in treating of the "cost principle," you do not grasp the whole significance of it, but confine it within the limits of labor performed; while the word was selected and is continually explained to include the sacrifices of all kinds that we make in serving each other. For instance, the inventor spends his time and money, and perhaps sacrifices a few nights' sleep; and, for a convenient phraseology, we say his machine has cost him time, money, and sleep. If this view of the word cost is borne in mind, the principle will not long be disputed, but will be acknowledged to be the basis of a new and successful civilization.

You instance two men: one picks up a brickbat, and the other a jewel; and you say that the cost principle requires that, the labor being the same, the one should exchange his jewel for the other's brickbat, entirely ignoring the fact that the cost principle justifies him in demanding compensation not only for the sacrifice of time and ease in getting possession of the jewel, but also for the sacrifice he makes in parting with it.

I don't know that I ought to be surprised at this misconception of the cost principle, since I have several times seen it announced as referring only to labor performed by the hands.

I may buy a house that I have particularly desired, and be willing to pay more for it than its labor cost. If I do this cheerfully, all is well; but when the owner stretches his demands beyond what he knows to be compensation for his labor and sacrifices, he has entered on cannibalism.

[Here the manuscript abruptly ends; the tired hand, which at last found it impossible to execute the bidding of the tireless mind, rested from its toil forever.—ED.]

THE CHRISTIANIZING FANATICISM.

Amongst your editorial paragraphs of February 19 there is one upon the subject of the Convention held at Pittsburgh by the Christian Amendment party, in which you state, "We consider it by no means improbable that they will succeed in this project [of getting 2,000,000 signatures to their petition]. Whoever believes the Christian Amendment movement to be devoid of vitality, power, or other elements of a formidable agitation will discover his mistake in due time." Well put remarks. Project and movement best characterize the undertaking, which is in full accord and harmony with that spirit of religious unrest, doubt, and uncertainty which so conspicuously marks and agitates the present period of the nineteenth century, the world over. The movement of human knowledge and of human liberty, accelerated by the protected right of freedom of opinion in this country, necessarily keeps up religious agitation—operating, however, as its true spirit dictates, peacefully—within the numerous sects professing religion, in its broad and universal acceptation.

In striking contrast with the Pittsburgh proposed Amendment to the United States Constitution, as framed and transmitted by our fathers (who were wiser in their day and generation than the modern children of light), THE INDEX sets forth a glorious proposal, broad and liberal,—confirming, enlarging, and thoroughly defining the first Amendment to the original Constitution. The aims and purposes of the Pittsburgh Convention appear to be insidious, subtle, deliberately conjuring up, by plausible appeals, an unwholesome inter-sectarian agitation which may reach the dignity (so to speak) and true character of a quasi-national fanaticism by the coming of the national centennial year.

The first Amendment to the United States Constitution ordained by our fathers is: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The use of the term religion is an acknowledgment of Almighty God, as he is understood to be by all civilized nations. Religion is defined to be—"belief in the being and perfections of God," in its most comprehensive sense, as understood by the people, either from tuition or education, and as entirely distinct from theology, or theological ideas and definitions of Christianity.

"Suitable acknowledgment of Almighty God as the author of the nation's existence, and the ultimate source of its authority; Jesus Christ as its [the nation's] ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its [the nation's] conduct"—is a theological definition both of Christianity and religion, and not the people's.

This country has, in less than a century, grown from the weakness of infancy into the strength and power of full manhood, under the influence and the spirit its founders breathed into our glorious Constitution—a document they designed to be the nation's Book of Life, its Holy Writ.

Although it provides in itself the mode of amendment, and the Pittsburgh Conventionites may have that mode in full view, it appears to me that no man of truly American heart and instincts, casting his vision back into that august assembly of noble patriots who formed, framed, and breathed their unbounded liberalism into the Constitution, can doubt that they did, in their very hearts, intend to make such suitable acknowledgment of Almighty God as was essential to secure his divine protection, and give strength and cohesion to the government. Their careful avoidance of any such special religious sentiment or belief, as the modern children of light are so anxious now to have incorporated into it, manifestly shows they foresaw that a republican form of government could only rest upon the consent of the people, and that religion could not be legislated upon without violation of the natural and inherent rights of the people. The fathers did not frame the first Amendment for their own generation, but for the lifetime of the republic. There were, perhaps, as many sects of religion represented, both in the convention which published the Declaration of Independence and in that which framed the Constitution, as there are sects now in the present age. The fathers—scholars, statesmen, Christian philosophers as they were—did suitably recognize the Almighty God sufficiently for the well-being of a nation, calling to all the people of the earth—"Come ye hither where ye shall enjoy freedom of religion as ye understand it, not as theologians teach it."

Is it possible, after nearly a century of the most unparalleled growth, prosperity, and happiness any nation ever attained, that the farther growth, prosperity, and happiness of this must languish and die out, unless a fuller acknowledgment, such as the Pittsburgh Conventionites desire, be forced into the national Constitution? Gloomy and discouraging indeed would such possibility be.

The very enunciation of the Christianity the Pittsburgh Conventionites seek to incorporate into the Constitution, if adopted by the States, would necessarily force a faith upon the whole people, be their individual convictions what they might: to wit, that Almighty God is the author of the nation's existence, Jesus Christ its chief ruler, the Bible the supreme rule of its conduct.

Though the majority of the people, as Christians, may believe it all, or a majority may not, they are too proud, if they will truly consider and value the proposition as a principle, to have it forced upon them.

The President of the Pittsburgh Convention, Mr. Brunot, says in his address: "We have not proposed to change these [fourth Article and first Amendment United States Constitution]. We deem them essential, in connection with the Amendment we ask, to the preservation of religious liberty." What sort of religious liberty would it be, if Atheists, Deists, Hebrews, Free-thinkers—good upright citizens,—called upon to take office and an oath to support the Constitution, are compelled to affirm in taking the oath that God is the author of the nation's existence, Jesus Christ its chief ruler, and the Bible the supreme rule of its conduct? Under THE INDEX'S proposed enlargement of the first Amendment, Jew, Gentile, Greek, Atheist, Deist, Mohammedan, all may enjoy unrestricted liberty of conscience as now. Under that of the Pittsburgh Convention's proposed Amendment, no!

The majority, under our form of government, rules; that is, in elections of officers, legislative bodies, in political affairs generally. But the voice of the majority in matters of religion or religious dogmas should ever be as the first Amendment designed they should be—silent and powerless.

If the first Amendment of the United States Constitution must needs be amended, modified, or enlarged at all, it ought to be the hope, and prayer, and earnest effort of every enlightened citizen that THE INDEX'S "Religious Freedom Amendment" will successfully antagonize and prevail over the Pittsburgh Conventionites' scheme. LIBERALIST.

BROOKLYN, N.Y., March, 1874.

ON BEHALF OF THE UNIVERSAL FREE-THINKERS' ASSOCIATION.

MR. EDITOR:—

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted by a full vote of the delegates of the Universal Freethinkers' Association, here in convention assembled in March, 1874, and continuing its sessions during the entire month. In accordance with the vote above referred to, I transmit this to you for publication.

DAVID HOYLE,
Chief Secretary U. F. A.,
No. 75 West Fifty-fourth Street, New York.

Whereas, The First Universal Freethinkers' Congress, held at Naples, in 1869, acknowledged and appointed this organization as its successor, and

Whereas, We, in convention here assembled, do agree upon and decide to convene the "Second Universal Freethinkers' Congress" at Philadelphia, Pa., U. S. A., on the fourth day of July, 1876, at noon. Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Convention issue a protocol to all Freethinkers throughout the world, directing them to form clubs at once, and that each separate group of clubs so formed by the different nationalities of the world elect a Secretary to correspond with the Chief Secretary of the U. F. A., David Hoyle, No. 75 West Fifty-fourth Street, New York city, U. S. A. It is furthermore

Resolved, That this Convention do hereby recognize and endorse the following gentlemen as Secretaries of present existing branches, to wit:—

D. M. Bennett, Secretary of the English branch of the U. F. A., 335 Broadway, New York.

M. Stein, Secretary of the German branch of the U. F. A., 58 Goerck Street, New York.

Marc Thrane, Secretary of the Scandinavian branch of the U. F. A., Box 63, Chicago, Ill.

And that all clubs of different nationalities that may be formed in the future address themselves to their own national Secretaries.

Resolved, That extra exertions shall be made by the different foreign members of the parent Association to create and organize French, Spanish, Italian, and Russian clubs and branches, as soon as possible, for which extra exertion a premium is offered by the parent Association.

Resolved, That the following gentlemen, having held the positions of Vice-Presidents under our former constitution, are endorsed and their actions approved by this Convention, and that they may be requested to send on their reports to our Chief Secretary, David Hoyle, as soon as this notice is received, and that the duties of said Vice-Presidents remain as heretofore.

Dr. Theodore Klein, Zürich, Switzerland.
Alfred Weigal, London, England.
Capt. Charles Armstrong, Box 8000, Chicago, Ill.
John Pollack, Pesth, Hungary.
Prof. Otto Meyer, Tacna, Peru, S. A.
Chr. Schwendiman, Hespelar, Ontario, C. W.
Dr. Zoeler, Callowhill Street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Prof. Shultz, Yorktown, Dewitt Co., Texas.
Hugh B. Brown, 267 Broadway, New York.
James Schroeder, Esq., Guttenberg, Clayton Co., Iowa.
G. Klauder, Box 309, Henderson, Ky.
S. Janowitz, 137 West Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md.
J. Nusser, Box 170, Birmingham, Bucks Co., Pa.

Resolved, That each club shall be represented at the next Congress by one or more delegates in person or by proxy.

Resolved, That we extend the hand of fellowship to Liberals of all shades, and Freethinkers of every caste, and that we especially extend a cordial invitation to all Liberal Leagues, Free Religious Associations, Liberal Spiritualists, and all anti-theological societies that work for the emancipation of the human race, to become members of our organization, and communicate with us. It was Ordered, by the Convention assembled, that all Secretaries of the various nationalities now existing or that may be formed in the future, together with all Vice-Presidents, shall communicate at once with our Chief Secretary, David Hoyle, and receive from him our amended Constitution and By-Laws, showing our object, aims, and means, which shall also be published in all our free-thought journals. It is furthermore

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent for publication to the following journals:—

Boston Investigator, INDEX, Truth Seeker, The Freethinker, Golden Age, Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly, Banner of Light, Religio-Philosophical Journal, The Word, Der Freidenker, Reformator, Pionier, and National Reformer, London, England.

(By order of the Convention.)

DAVID HOYLE, Chief Secretary U. F. A.,
75 West Fifty-fourth Street, New York.

THE STATE PRISON ABUSES.

BY F. B. SANBORN.

The prison question is, every month, taking on more and more the character of a popular issue, and ceasing to be the exclusive topic of a few persons, in which the great public could not be induced to feel any interest. There was a time, thirty years ago, when it engrossed public attention in Boston, almost as much as the question of slavery; and Charles Sumner then made one of his great speeches upon it, having previously written about it in the Christian Examiner, and debated it in meetings of the now extinct Prison Discipline Society, where he opposed the "wrath and partiality" of Louis Dwight and his Boston friends. The speech is printed in the first volume of Sumner's works, followed by a letter from M. de Tocqueville in praise of its argument. This was in 1847. In 1822, a quarter of a century earlier, Josiah Quincy, then a judge in Boston, had taken part in an agitation of the same kind, for the reformation of prisons, out of which grew this same Boston Prison Discipline Society. But in many respects things are now as bad as they were in 1822, when Mr. Quincy said, speaking of a law of Massachusetts: "The act looks well upon paper. Strangers who know nothing of our laws but in the statute book will wonder and admire at the providence of our Legislature. But citizens who know facts and see effects must feel something like contempt for such provisions; unless, indeed, a higher and holier sentiment shall invite them indignantly to urge upon their representatives the disgrace which results to a commonwealth from wise laws existing in form, and being repealed in effect; from those who ought to be the fathers of the State condescending to promise reformation, and, under that promise, continuing old abuses." This continuance of old abuses is exactly what is taking place now at the Charlestown prison, under a warden who has never learned the alphabet of prison discipline, and who governs as capriciously as he spells.

Exactly what prospect there is of improvement at Charlestown is uncertain. Under the new organization of the board of inspectors there (Mr. Weston Lewis being chairman and Dr. Estes Howe taking the place of Mr. Hall), the warden no longer has a veto on the inspectors, and new regulations are promised, which will correct some of the neglects and abuses that have grown up. When the prison committee of the Legislature visited Charlestown, last week, some of the members went into the hospital, and found that neither the diet nor the cleanliness of the beds and clothing was what it should be; and one of them has stated that the clothing of some of the sick prisoners is only washed once in three weeks. There has been much complaint, also, concerning the quality of the clothing given out to prisoners when discharged; and this is to be improved. The prison labor is, of course, much disorganized by the loss of the workshops, and the earnings will, this year, fall off considerably from the estimate made last October. In the more important matters of discipline and reformation, it is doubtful if much can be done until a warden is appointed who comprehends, and is in sympathy with, the best sentiment and highest wisdom concerning the treatment of prisoners, and is willing to coöperate with these rather than to sneer at and obstruct them. Meantime the new prison is to be built at Concord, but for only seven hundred and fifty convicts instead of one thousand, and with some better facilities for classifying and employing them. The work proceeds slowly, and I believe the plans are not yet adopted by the building commissioners, but probably ground will be broken on the new location in course of the spring. The finance committee, which has had the bill for a women's prison under consideration for some weeks, could not agree in favor of it, and there is some doubt about its passage; but its friends are hopeful, and it will probably be carried.

In 1845, the late Dr. Wayland, of Brown University, writing to Charles Sumner, said: "It seems that John Augustus, a poor man, has done much. We praise him. This is well. Can we not take means for following his example?" This John Augustus was a Boston shoemaker, who devoted himself to the rescue of children and poor persons from prisons and from a life of crime; and it was of him that Judge Hoar said, a few years later, when it was proposed to enlarge the Westboro Reform School, that "he would not vote money to build that structure any bigger, but would cheerfully add a couple of wings to John Augustus." He has been dead now for many years (he died in 1859). The present John Augustus, his son, was unlucky enough, three or four years ago, to get sentenced to State Prison for some mercantile offence. It was not so culpable as Secretary Richardson's issue of the bogus "reserve," and was positively praiseworthy in comparison with the Sanborn contracts. But as King Lear said:—

> "Through tattered clothes small vices do appear,
> Robes and furred gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold
> (Greenbacks will do as well if sin's stuffed with 'em),
> And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
> Arm it in rags, a pygmy's straw doth pierce it."

So John Augustus went to Charlestown for three years, while Richardson, for signing the Sanborn contracts, was made Secretary of the Treasury for three years. In prison, Augustus was exemplary in conduct, and since he came out, last fall, has not only conducted himself well, but has become, like his father, an active philanthropist, and now seeks to improve the condition of his fellow-prisoners, both at Charlestown and after their discharge. He has written a book about prison life (as I mentioned, some weeks since), which is to be published in May or June, and he is making arrangements to start a weekly newspaper, The Prisoner's Friend, to discuss the whole subject of prison discipline. Several persons of ability and reputation have promised to write for this paper; it will give some attention also to the imprisonment of the insane in great hospitals without proper classification, and Mrs. St. John, the author of Bella, a novel founded on hospital experiences at Worcester and elsewhere, will probably be a contributor. It may not be a very judicious enterprise to publish such a paper, but Mr. Augustus has made up his mind to do it, and will, no doubt, begin its publication before summer. A paper or magazine of the same name was printed in Boston, many years ago, by the brothers Charles and John M. Spear; but that was edited by amateurs, and not, as this will be, by a man who has had personal experience of what prison life is. I have seen no specimens of his writing, except the dedication of his book. He is a fluent, rather garrulous, talker, active, and persistent, and may prove to be a successful journalist. His purpose is not purely philanthropic, for he has his own living to earn; but he is as sincerely interested in prison reform as most of the persons I meet, and knows much more than they do of the subject he is interested in. Thus far his efforts have done good, and it is hard to see how they can do harm. The dense ignorance of the public on this subject should be enlightened in all possible ways. Many of his friends here aid him for his father's sake, others because he is aiming at a good work.—Springfield Republican.

MRS. CHENEY'S TRIBUTE TO SUMNER.

A request from the West for the preservation in print of Mrs. Cheney's remarks, at a recent meeting of the Radical Club, relative to Mr. Sumner, has led to the following note, which we have the pleasure of publishing:—

JAMAICA PLAIN, April 10, 1874.

Dear Mrs. Sargent,—I send enclosed sketch of the few words I said at your house. But I always think of Emerson's "Each in All" at such meetings, and indeed that feeling is the charm of them. We cannot "bring home the river and sky." Mr. Julian's ready sympathy gave more meaning to the words than they will have in the repetition. They came out of a full heart, surely; for I think I never felt "How blest the good man when he dies" so strongly as in the sense of faith in humanity and moral power which Sumner left with us. Is there a spiritual correlation of forces, and did something of human power which he gave up become energized in us? It does seem as if something better must come for the country out of all this rich life than Butlerism and Financial Inflation.

Yours very truly, EDNAH D. CHENEY.

REMARKS.

There seems to be a want in human nature which the Church ought to supply. It ought to be the social expression of the highest feelings, the noblest moral sense. We felt this on the day of Charles Sumner's funeral, when the throng of people left their business and their homes, all feeling that the day should be consecrated to other than ordinary uses. All in that hour seemed by the idealizing power of death to be lifted up to his height of moral being. One thought of the words of Jesus: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." Should it not have been the office of the Church to deepen and fix the feeling of the hour, and so help to make it a perpetual influence in men's lives? It seemed as if every church should have been open, and the memory of his life set to music or beautiful speech in them, so that the multitude, instead of aimless wandering about the streets, should have known where to turn for the influence which would calm the grief of the hour, while it made more lasting the great lessons of a noble, heroic life, which was a perpetual service to God in Humanity.—Boston Sunday Gazette.

PARKER TO SUMNER.

[Such a letter as the one below could only have come from a great spirit, and only have been welcome to a spirit equally great. Weighing every word of it, the hopes it breathed were fulfilled in Sumner as if it were a prophecy. No one imagines the great Senator to have been faultless; but for moral majesty no such figure has elsewhere appeared in American politics. If Parker had stood by his grave, he would have said, though with a broken voice: "You have done better than I advised."—ED.]

BOSTON, Apr. 26, 1851.

DEAR SUMNER,—

I have not been able to come and offer my congratulations on your election. I was almost at your office this morning, when I met some one who told me that you were not there; so you will accept my written congratulations instead of the spoken, and let me read you a bit of a sermon. Perhaps you had better lay this away till Sunday, for I am going to preach. You told me once you were in morals and not in politics. Now I hope you will show that you are still in morals although in politics. I hope that you will be a Senator with a conscience. The capital error of all our politicians is this: with understanding and practical sagacity, with cunning and power to manage men, in a heroic degree; in moral power, in desire of the true and the right, "first good, first perfect, and first fair," they are behind the carpenters and blacksmiths. Look at Cass, Woodbury, Webster, Clay, Calhoun—nay, even at J. Q. Adams. The majority of the shoemakers in Norfolk County had a love of justice which bore a greater proportion to their whole being than Adams' to his. He never led in any moral movement.

Now I look to you to be a leader in this matter; to represent justice, quae semper et ubique eadem est. If you do not do this, you will wofully disappoint the expectations of the people in this country. It is a strange sight to see men as much inferior in moral power as they are superior in intellectual power; as much inferior in willingness to sacrifice for their country as they are superior in station. I expect you to make mistakes, blunders; I hope they will be intellectual and not moral, that you may never miss the right, however much you may miss the expedient.

Then you told me once that you should never find it more difficult to make a personal sacrifice for the true or the right than in 1845. It seems to me, just as you take a high office in the State, you are bound more and more to perfect yourself for the sake of the State; to deny yourself for the sake of the State. I consider that Massachusetts has put you where you have no right to consult for the ease or reputation of yourself, but for the eternal Right. All our statesmen build, on the opinion of to-day, a house that is to be admired to-morrow, and the next day torn down with hootings. I hope you will build on the Rock of Ages, and look to eternity for your justification.

You see, my dear Sumner, that I expect much of you, that I expect heroism of the most heroic kind. The moral and manly excellence of all our prominent men is greatly overrated by the mass of men. I hope that you will never be overrated by the people, but will overshoot their estimate of you. Yours is a place of great honor, of great trust, but of prodigious peril; and of that there will be few to warn you, as I now do; few to encourage you as I gladly would. You see I try you by a difficult standard, and that I am not easily pleased. I hope some years hence to say, "You have done better than I advised." I hope you will believe me what I am, sincerely your friend,

THEODORE PARKER.

HERE IS A NICE name for a newspaper: The Journal of the Disciples of Satan. Such is the title of a new paper which has appeared at Palermo, Sicily, for the benefit of the youth of that city. The Young Men's Free Thinking Association, of that city, hailed its appearance in the following terms: "We salute the birth of a paper which bears the name of the true god, the god of science, liberty, and progress, the god we worship—Satan." A government which permits the circulation of such a paper undoubtedly is "preparing its own coffin," as the French say. Such periodicals as the above paved the way for the French revolution of '93. Italy should not forget the "terror."—Catholic Review.

RICHARD A. PROCTOR, the astronomer, writes: "I know an English scientist, far too skilful for us to afford to have his energies wasted, who has been working for two years to obtain results which, I have learned since my arrival here, were demonstrated a quarter of a century ago in this country."

LAND AND SEA.

BY MRS. DAVID H. CLARK.

Afar the hills in softened splendor lie,
Swathed in the kingly purple of the air;
While, on the golden ladders of the sky,
Ascending and descending angels bear
The chrism of Light—the anointing Life of all:
And, garlanded in sweet September grace,
The pliant earth, tranced in such loving thrall,
Smiles like a dear babe to its mother's face.

* * * * * *

Oh, changeful glory of the autumn day!
Faint shadows creep, with slow, reluctant feet,
O'er all the violet hills, that turn to gray;
The fresh wind blows the pine bough's spicy sweet;
And darkening tremors run along the wold,
Beneath the glancing of the pale first star,
That deepens from its amber into gold—
As sunset dies beyond the harbor-bar.

Harbor of hope! Where soon his sail must lie,
Who comes to greet me o'er wide leagues of sea
From constellations of a Southern sky,
Whom days and hours are bringing home to me:

Home from the palm-fringed shores of fairy isles,
Set, sapphire-like, in gold of sunlit wave,—
Where never-ending summer wreathes and smiles,
And sirens murmur from their coral cave.

Sirens! But not to him whose faithful soul
Enshrines one image, and that image mine.
Blow, happy winds, and haste him to the goal
Whose reaching shall be crowned with Love's red wine;

When each shall hold the other dearer far
Because of perils that have ceased to be,
While sunset dies beyond the harbor-bar,
And, dying, glorifies the tranquil sea.

GLIMPSES.

THE LONDON Academy says that Mr. Darwin is engaged on "a revised and extended edition of the Descent of Man."

REV. MR. TALMAGE avers that "Heaven never burns down." If John Milton was well informed, Lucifer once contrived to get up a pretty serious fire-alarm in it.

PRESIDENT GRANT has deserved well of his countrymen by his veto of the inflation bill. To have saved the financial honor of the country will atone for many grave mistakes, less hurtful than that of Congress.

AS ANNOUNCED in our advertising columns, there will be some private theatricals next week for the benefit of the Free Religious Association. "Act well your part"—is a good rule of life; and kind friends of the Association will show us all how to do it.

PROFESSOR MUELLER, in the Academy, has given a very valuable recapitulation of the discoveries of Dr. Schliemann on the site of ancient Troy. But he puts small faith in the Doctor's glowing imaginations about Priam and his worthies, whose whole story he ranks with other myths.

REV. DR. HODGE, of Princeton, the great blue-light of Presbyterianism, declares that "no man is a Darwinian who does not desire to be one." As between Darwinians and Hodgians, this desire may certainly be forgiven. But did you ever see a Doctor of Divinity who could discover any other root of heresy than an "evil heart of unbelief"?

IT IS certainly a cheering sign of the times that about twenty of the most prominent clergy of Philadelphia should unite to invite Anna Dickinson to address the public of that city on the question of licensing the "social evil." Woman's plea for woman ought to be heard with profound respect; and no doubt Miss Dickinson can afford needed instruction to many a D.D. on this subject.

THE LIBERALS of Wisconsin are stirring vigorously in behalf of church taxation. The Milwaukee Sentinel of April 15 details an interview with Dr. Hübschmann, who states that the plan is to bring a test case before the Supreme Court of that State. A bill was reported in the Wisconsin Legislature, in 1872, providing for the abolition of all tax-exemption, and its supporters still hope to see it become a law.

NEARLY TWO-THIRDS of the real estate of Turkey, under the policy of tax-exemption, had come into possession of the mosques, when, a few months ago, the Sultan was compelled to imitate Henry VIII. and confiscate it. France, Italy, and Mexico have all been driven to the same step. If the churches of the United States are wise, they will be willing to be taxed now rather than incur a worse fate hereafter.

FROM A RECENT volume by Mr. J. Norman Lockyer (editor of Nature), published by Macmillan with the title Contributions to Solar Physics, it appears that there are no compound vapors in the sun, although they seem to exist in the atmosphere of some of the stars; and that there are vaporized substances in it which are unknown on the earth. So rapid is the progress of solar physics that a very few years are enough to render books on the subject antiquated.

THE Independent of April 16 has a long editorial account of the wrangling of the missionary Boards over possession of the native Japanese churches of Yedo and Yokohama, and a translation of a very dignified protest by these churches against it, which the Independent calls "the most withering rebuke that we remember to have seen of this cursed spirit of sectarianism." But sectarianism is inseparable from Christianity, and will outlive all such protests. The only remedy for it is one which the Independent shrinks from applying.

HERE IS an appeal from the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage which could have proceeded from no one less thoroughly de-witted: "Young men of the Theological seminaries! Read less of Thomas Carlyle and Ralph Waldo Emerson, and more of Richard Cecil and Samuel Rutherford. We like new things brisk and breezy; but the story of Christ is as old as Calvary, and the Law is as old as Sinai, and the system of Theology is a sham which has not in it the two mountains." The "Ark of Salvation" is doubtless a pretty stout craft; but if it can ride the sea of modern thought with a brace of mountains stowed away in its hold for ballast, it is a bigger ship than we suspected.

A RESPECTED CONTRIBUTOR to the "Communications" department of THE INDEX inquires why his article was not printed,—as many others have inquired before him. We simply plead our inability to put a quart into a pint-pot. Somebody's communications have to go without publication for want of room; and we print by preference those that we think most likely to be interesting or useful to our readers. Our judgment is certainly very fallible; those whose articles do not get printed probably think it a very wretched judgment, and scarcely worth having. But as it is the best we have, we are obliged to depend on it, regretting that narrowness of space crowds out so many good contributions.

IT IS wonderful how tenacious of life is error. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:" yes, and error as well. The reason is that thought, whether true or false, tends to perpetuate itself,—to run from mind to mind, and soon to pass beyond the reach of any refutation. Pastor Knaak, of Berlin, can preach still that the sun moves round the earth; and radicals can still echo the disproved derivation of "religion" from religare. It is a cheerful hope that the results of scholarship will by-and-by become a part of common knowledge; but so long as free thinkers—the Freethinker itself—can reiterate this ancient and exploded blunder of Lactantius, it is a hope that demands a sublime optimism to feed on.

THE REVISED EDITION of the Unitarian creed is—"I believe in Christianity as I understand it." When, in strict accordance with this creed, the Liberal Christian said a few months ago that—"A man may be a Pantheist or an Atheist, and, if he call himself a Christian and is not immoral in life, he may join the Unitarian Conference and claim as good ecclesiastical standing as the most conservative believer," the editor of the Investigator very forcibly replied: "That is to say, if a Pantheist or an Atheist will acknowledge that he is what he is not (or, in other words, will play the hypocrite), he can be considered a Unitarian Christian. Blessed privilege and magnanimous offer! As old Mr. Weller said to his son Samivel when learning the alphabet, "It is going through a great deal to get at a little."

AN "EVANGELICAL MINISTERS' ASSOCIATION" has been lately formed in Boston. Its second Article (which is binding on all the members) is as follows: "The doctrinal basis of this Association is the broad, historic, evangelical, catholic ground, which has been occupied by all vital Christians from the beginning; embracing the belief in the Divine Human Person and the atoning work of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and the personality and the regenerating and sanctifying offices of the Holy Spirit, as the only source of salvation, and the centre of all true Christian union and fellowship." This has been the doctrinal ground of "all vital Christians" from the beginning; yet we are thought to be very unfair by Unitarians for taking Christianity at its word—as if a small sect scarcely fifty years old had a right to put a totally new meaning on a word defined by the consensus of the whole church for at least fifteen centuries! The real unfairness will by-and-by be clearly discerned.

HOW EX-CONVICTS ARE TREATED.

As our readers know, a young man nineteen years old was discharged from the Massachusetts State Prison last November who had served a five years' sentence for "breaking and entering." The name under which he was committed (as usual, an assumed one) was James Burns. Instead of "keeping quiet" on being discharged, as most ex-convicts do, he has undertaken the perilous task of exposing what he believes to be abuses in the administration of the prison, for the sake of securing a reformation of them. He believes that, if he is ever incarcerated in that institution again, his lot will be rendered a very hard one by way of retaliation for this exposure; he remembers the advice given in more pungent than elegant phrase by an ex-official of the prison—"Young man, keep out of prison, or your goose is cooked!" But he persists in making his statements publicly; and they have at least had the effect of arousing no little interest in this community. That he is sincere, there is very little room for doubt in our own mind; that his impressions and statements are all accurate, may be fairly doubted until a thorough investigation has been had, and both sides fully heard. But that he has been accused unjustly in at least one important instance by officials connected with the State Prison, is a demonstrated fact, as the following evidence shows.

On the twentieth of February last, two convicts named Worthing and Jones effected their escape from the prison. The report of this occurrence in the Boston Herald closed with this paragraph: "The officers of the prison have on three occasions lately observed James Burns, alias Cotier—a former inmate, who is now lecturing on prison reform—about the prison, and on Thursday he was seen beckoning and heard shouting to some one inside the walls. They therefore express some suspicion that he was privy to the escape of these men." This paragraph at once called out a protest in the same paper and in the Globe from a philanthropic lady of Charlestown, at whose house Burns was hospitably entertained some seven weeks on his release from prison. She wrote: "The officers know he was not there. Every minute of his time for that day can be accounted for, from early in the morning till dark, or later. What earthly motive but to injure the young man can there be in these insinuations or assertions?" In reply to the card of this lady two letters were published in the Globe, dated February 25, and written by two officers of the prison. One of them, Mr. J. F. Moore, said: "Last Thursday (19th), about 11 o'clock in the forenoon, I saw a man on Canal Street, which [sic] I did then and do now believe to be the same Burns. He was shouting and motioning with his hands to the prisoners, several of whom saw him and believed it to be him. I walked out to the wall and ordered him away, and he left. This was the day before the escape of Worthing and Jones." To this circumstantial testimony, the lady above referred to (an article by whom with the initials M. S. W. was published in our last week's issue) replied in the Globe as follows: "On Thursday, the 19th—the day Officer Moore 'saw Burns shouting and motioning, and ordered him away'—Burns was before the Investigating Committee on Prisons, at the State House, from before 10 till past 1 o'clock, as the Hon. Mr. Nye, Chairman of the Committee, ex-Deputy Whitcomb, Inspector Lewis, and others, can testify." A more satisfactory alibi was never proved. So overwhelming was the proof of Mr. Burns' innocence of the charge made against him, that Mr. Daniel Russell, State Agent and Agent for the Massachusetts Society for Aiding Discharged Convicts, went to the Warden of the prison, General Chamberlain, and informed him that Burns could not possibly have been seen as alleged by Officer Moore. Yet the charge stands unretracted to-day, false and injurious as it is, and is well known to be!

Now this attempt to break down the reputation of Mr. Burns, and to destroy all the effect of his unwelcome revelations, by accusations which have been absolutely proved to be false, deserves to be denounced in the severest terms. Why has not Warden Chamberlain, without whose approval it is incredible that Officer Moore published his statement, put a card into the papers, exonerating Mr. Burns from this most injurious charge of endeavoring to help convicts escape from prison? If the Warden for reasons best known to himself refuses to do it, why does not State Agent Russell, who is paid by the State to befriend discharged convicts, befriend Mr. Burns in the most efficient way by coming forward now on his behalf to repel a slander which he has confessed he knows to be such? Their silence, when so gross a wrong demands their loud and instant speech, has done more than anything else to convince our own mind that Mr. Burns' story is substantially true. If there was no evil to be covered up, no such transparent determination to crush him would exist. We have no interest in the matter whatever, except a strong desire to see justice done, wrongs righted, and reforms begun; we do not intend to foreclose the case in our own thought until there has been a faithful and impartial investigation of the whole subject; but that the Warden and State Agent, who should be the first to lend a helping hand to a discharged convict-boy unjustly accused, now suffer a stigma to rest upon him which a word from either would at once remove, is of itself a proof that "something is rotten in the State of Denmark." It has been said that "the loudest, most sweeping, and most persistent complaints are sure to come from the vicious and ill-disposed." On the contrary, the testimony is that the most vicious convicts, who are the most likely to get into prison again, are afraid to complain publicly even of real injustices they may be made to suffer; they dread the resentment of those who have power to make them feel it most severely on a return to confinement. If Mr. Burns consulted his own interest, he would remove to a distant part of the country, and conceal the fact of his imprisonment; he would make a new record, and wish all to forget the old one. But now he braves the public opinion against discharged prisoners, and renders it very difficult to escape its consequences. Is it not unlikely that selfish motives should prompt to such a course? If he is a humbug and a sham, he cannot be exposed too soon; but if, as we think, he has with uncommon pluck set himself to work under every conceivable disadvantage to rouse attention to real abuses in the State Prison, for the sake of those still confined there, let him not be burdened with such a load of false accusation as its officers have put on his back and the State Agent declines to lift off. Justice, gentlemen, justice—that is all we ask; and that will come yet.

P.S.—Since writing the above, a meeting of the Second Radical Club was held on April 27, at which Warden Chamberlain was present by special invitation, and made a long opening address in defence of his administration of the State Prison against the many criticisms it has received of late. He said explicitly that Officer Moore was mistaken in the testimony he gave, in the letter quoted above, as to seeing James Burns about the prison on February 19; and that he now acquits the latter of all complicity whatever with the escape of Worthing and Jones. To a direct question we put whether he was willing to make this exculpatory statement, over his own name, in the same newspaper that had contained Officer Moore's mistaken accusation, and thereby do justice to Mr. Burns, he responded, "Most certainly." We hope that this promise will be faithfully kept. Tardy as this act of bare justice will be, it will do something to prevent future harm to Mr. Burns from the now acknowledged slander.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 28th and 29th of May. The meeting will open with a session for business and addresses on Thursday evening, the 28th, at 7 3-4 o'clock, in Horticultural Hall (lower). At this session the following Amendments to the Constitution are to be acted upon:—

1. In the statement of the objects of the Association in the First Article, to change the phraseology so as to read thus: "Its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history."

2. To change the number of Directors, now limited by the Second Article to "six," so that the number shall be "not less than six nor more than ten."

On Friday, the 29th, there will be sessions for essays and addresses, forenoon and afternoon, in the upper Horticultural Hall, and a Social Festival in the evening at the new Parker Memorial Hall.

Interesting topics are to be discussed by able speakers,—of which further particulars will be given hereafter. WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary.

F. R. A. ANNUAL MEETING.

The notice required by its Constitution of the approaching Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, is inserted in this week's INDEX. It is too early yet to give all the particulars in respect to the subjects to be discussed and the speakers who will address the Convention. It may be said, however, that the arrangements promise a very interesting occasion. A number of able speakers who have not before spoken on the platform of the Association are expected to be present, and each session will have features of special interest. It is proposed to make even the business session one of solid worth and vitality, by devoting a portion of it to addresses on various practical phases of the free religious movement; while, as last year, the meetings are to culminate in a Social Festival, which, in the hands of the same committee that made it so charming an occasion last May, cannot fail to be a most attractive success. That the Festival is to be in the new Hall, consecrated to the memory of Theodore Parker, will give it an additional attractiveness.

At the business session two amendments to the Constitution are to be presented for action. One of them simply gives power to enlarge the number of Directors. The other is a change in the phraseology of the statement of the objects of the Association as expressed in the Second Article. This change—or the substance of it—was proposed last year by the venerable Lucretia Mott. Her special purpose was to get rid of the word "theology" which now stands in the Article, and which to her mind has always suggested those dogmatic systems of faith that are generally taught in theological seminaries, and have been such a barrier to religious progress. Others have felt the same objection. Others again have said that "the scientific study of theology" is a tautological phrase, since "theology," properly defined, is itself a science, or is claimed to be. The proposed change will obviate these objections, while it will express quite as well, or better, what those who framed the Constitution had in mind when they used the phrase "scientific study of theology." By connecting the word "scientific" with "theology," they meant to indicate, not that kind of study of theology which is ordinarily pursued in theological schools for the training of sectarian ministers, but that free investigation after religious truth which is carried on by free minds, and of which such researches as are made by Max Müller and Tylor are notable illustrations. They meant the application of the scientific method of study, instead of the dogmatic method, to man's religious nature and religious history; and since the proposed change more clearly expresses this idea, it is desirable that it should be adopted.

It will be seen that Friday's Convention, is to be held, not in Tremont Temple where it has usually met, but in Horticultural Hall, where the Association was first organized seven years ago. W. J. P.

IMMORTALITY.

The Easter season is passed, but a thought on it may not be amiss. The theme of the season was, as usual, immortality; and the familiar strain that the Gospel had brought life and immortality to light was sounded once more from Christian pulpits. Preachers told the people with all the ancient confidence that Christianity guaranteed immortality, and that with the decline of faith in Christianity the hope of man would die. Now if there be one thing well ascertained and thoroughly demonstrable, it is that Christianity distinctly, professedly, purposely limits the hope of immortality. Its peculiarity consists in this. That immortality is the natural hope of man, and the destiny of all men, is not a doctrine of the Christian religion. The doctrine of the Christian religion is that a future life, in any intelligible sense, as understood by mankind at large, is for the Christian believers, and for them alone. This was Paul's teaching, as his genuine epistles, and most especially the first Epistle to the Corinthians, show: "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." "If Christ be not raised, then they who have fallen asleep in Christ (Christians who have died) are perished." "Christ, the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming." "The last Adam was made a quickening spirit." Paul, as a Pharisee, believed already that men survived death, after a fashion, and continued to exist in a nebulous, but unsatisfactory, manner, to which the term "life" could not with the least propriety be applied. There was nothing in the anticipation, even by good men, to make death seem otherwise than terrible. It was a hopeless hope, which gave neither inspiration nor comfort. All sinners must die; and, as all men were sinners, all men must die, and pass into the dismal under-world of ghosts. The sinless man could not die. Christ was the sinless man, and consequently died not, but rose from the sepulchre into the open air of a new existence. This sinlessness was the ground of his resurrection; his resurrection guaranteed his sinlessness. With him begins a new series of experience in regard to the future life; for they who have faith in him, and, by living faith, join themselves to him, become sharers in his immortal privilege. But none others did. The rest, be they who and what they might,—philosophers, sages, valiant and good men,—must continue the long procession to that Sheol, which was scarcely an advance on annihilation.

And all the time that Paul was preaching this narrow, exclusive doctrine, the Jewish rabbins, as we know from the Talmud, were teaching a noble, spiritual philosophy,—the immortality of man as man; individual continuance after death, with full consciousness of personality; the equal hope and common destination to bliss of all men, Jews and heathen alike; the existence of a rational principle which had the seed of immortality in it; the possibility for every soul of freeing itself from sensual bonds, and mounting to the holy seats. The old faith opened richer prospects than the new; Christianity closed doors instead of bursting them.

The doctrine of Paul is the doctrine of the New Testament throughout, as has been proved over and over again, as has been from the beginning claimed by the consistent members of the Christian communion. The Church, instead of widening the aperture from death to life has rather made it closer. Immortality for believers has been the teaching. "Thou hast opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers" is the language of the ancient creed as voiced in the Te Deum. The Bishop of Manchester is reported as having, in his late Easter sermon, pointedly corrected the impression that his religion taught or implied the natural immortality of mankind, or promised a future life to all men; affirming, on the contrary, that the resurrection was reserved for Christ's own, who "lived in him," and that for others only a hope was to be indulged. He was frank enough to give no encouragement to any but churchmen, herein showing himself a faithful reporter of the original tradition.

If this were the only way in which "Christianity" curtailed the privilege of immortality, we might be happy, for there was nothing absolutely appalling in the contemplation of Sheol, a negative state of being, in which, if there was no joy, there was no sorrow; they who were shut out from the Christian's exclusive privilege had nothing to look forward to more dreadful than extinction, or something akin to it. But "Christianity" has taken away that sad hope. For the shady Sheol it has substituted a flaming hell, and for the melancholy boon of annihilation an inevitable future of conscious pain. So even the New Testament does. In opening a world of light above the gloomy abodes, Paul opened new abysses of sorrow below it.

It is simply a mistake to ascribe to Christianity an enlargement of the belief in a future life. The faith in natural immortality came from other sources, and is due to other teaching. The Christian doctrine is the resurrection of the body through faith in Christ. They who hold a belief distinct from this derive but little support from the Church. The Talmud gives them more countenance than the Gospels. For the Talmud repudiates the notion of everlasting damnation for anybody, declaring that there is a space of "only two fingers' breadth between hell and heaven." It is in the Gospel that we read of the "great gulf" that is fixed, which cannot be passed over. It is as men have departed from the Christian tradition that they have had life and immortality brought to light.

AN INSIDE VIEW.

A Western woman, of uncommon intellectual ability, and undisputed Orthodox position, writes as follows. T. W. H.

"So thoroughly was I inoculated with puritanism that I am afraid I never shall outgrow the effects of it, and take any other ism with safety and enjoyment. . . . My aim is to do right for the right's sake. There is no comfort in wrong-doing. If there were no Scripture teachings on this point, there is self-respect, almost as authoritative. The drift of pulpits is not in the direction of this 'one thing needful.' It keeps before one the necessity of the new birth before one can enter the kingdom, forgetting that self-respect renders almost unnecessary that great change. I do not see that our most ardent Christians value themselves very highly, or hold humanity in esteem. Outside the Church philanthropy thrives best, and they who wear chains are helped most by those who believe as you do. These facts trouble me. I would like to have 'believers' stand at least by the side of heretics if they will not lead in the matter."

HAMPTON AND ITS STUDENTS. By two of its teachers, Mrs. M. F. Armstrong and Helen W. Ludlow. With fifty Cabin and Plantation Songs, arranged by Thomas J. Lenner. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This handsome volume is a very welcome addition to the record of the great epoch through which we have so recently passed, covering the emancipation of the country and four millions of its people from slavery. In giving an account of one of the most important efforts to educate the freedmen, it throws much light upon the condition of the slaves before the war, upon the characteristics of the negro race, and upon the requisite conditions for their future improvement.

Gen. Armstrong has rightly seen that the development of the material resources of the State through skilled labor, and the intellectual education of the whole people, is the great hope of Virginia; and, in supplying the State with teachers of her primary schools, he is at the same time diffusing through them a great deal of useful, practical knowledge. This experiment is interesting and encouraging in reference to the great question of industrial education, as well as for its bearings on the elevation of the negro.

The only discouraging point we have noted is the expense of this education, which is put at $70 per annum [p. 48], exclusive of board and clothing. As this is more than three times the average cost per head in the best schools of the largest cities, it seems as if this system could not be very widely extended, unless its price can be reduced. And this is, after all, the great difficulty in industrial education, as in most of the improvements proposed in our school system. While a favored few may be benefitted, it is not yet found possible to secure results at such a price as to put them within the means of all. All public expense is of course really borne by the productive labor of the whole people, no matter in what way accumulated capital favors it. Now, calling the average value of labor two dollars and a half a day, it would take twenty-eight days of a man's labor to support one child at school, and this is a pretty severe tax; even when, as in this case, the child pays a part of his board and clothing.

As a model and normal school, this one may be worth all it costs; but it does not prove that the great desideratum has been discovered—how to educate the whole people at a reasonable price.

The teachers bear the same testimony that all acquainted with the freedmen have borne, to their eagerness for knowledge and their readiness to profit by instruction. They also speak of that beautiful quality of forgiveness, so strong in the negro race, which makes them averse to speak of the wrongs they have endured, and ready to pardon and assist their old masters, when opportunity offers. One amusing exception is, however, given of an old man who told with much pride of his experiencing religion.

"Then, as you have experienced religion, Mr. Jarvis," said his visitor, "I suppose you have forgiven your old master, haven't you?"

It was an unexpected blow. The glow died out of his face, and his head dropped. There was evidently a mental struggle. Then he straightened himself, his features set for an inevitable conclusion. "Yes, sah! I'se forgab him; de Lord knows I'se forgab him; but—" his eye kindled again as the human nature burst forth—"but I'd give my oder leg to meet him in battle." Negroes are very like white folks, certainly.

Another service rendered by this book is the preservation of fifty of the most popular cabin and plantation songs, such as the Hampton singers have sung throughout the country. These songs represent a phase of life and religion which is rapidly passing away. Pass it must, and unregretted; but, like every other phase of life, it has its philosophic and artistic value, and helps us to understand human nature and its divine relations better.

There is a curious melodic charm in the words of these songs, though wholly destitute of intellectual value; as in—

> "Oh swing low, sweet chariot,
> Swing low, sweet chariot,
> Swing low, sweet chariot;
> I don't want to leave me behind."

One of them,—called "Religion is a fortune,"—is a very genuine expression of their feeling, that to get religion is a matter of good luck, quite independent of the will of the receiver:—

> "Oh religion is a fortune,
> I raly do believe," etc.

The Hampton singers are again about to visit us, and there will undoubtedly be a renewed interest in their songs from the study of this book.

It is very desirable that such records as these should be preserved. "History never repeats itself;" certainly the history of the last twelve years never can be repeated on this continent, and every memorial of it should be carefully preserved. E. D. C.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Madras Athenæum describes a procession in Salem, Madras Presidency. He says: "I observed some devotees had their tongues pierced with iron rods; some had pins stuck all over their bodies, and garlands hanging from them; some had made incisions in their sides, in which were inserted iron rods; some passed through these incisions large ropes, held on both sides by two persons; and some employed four men to carry a small car, the middle of whose axles passed through their sides." Such heathen have not advanced far in civilization.

A PROTEST.

DEAR ABBOT:—

I wish to protest against the character of the "London Letter" printed in THE INDEX of April 9. Had it appeared in any other than a professedly liberal publication, its appearance still would have been a surprise. For I must think that even our Orthodox friends are getting above such wholesale attacks upon the motives of people from whom they differ. Mr. Voysey as a "free-thinker" ought not to be permitted without rebuke to write in this fashion. Could he not state his objections to "free love," and even describe all the evils which in his judgment would flow from its practice, without impeaching the moral purpose of those who are known as its advocates? "You tell us," he says, in effect, "that you do not mean evil? Out upon ye, we are not fools! Do you think we are such dolts as not to see through your flimsy disguise?". Now in my judgment any High Church devotee might find it as difficult "to write with becoming patience" of Mr. Voysey and his "sickly nonsense" of "free religion," as Mr. Voysey does of Mrs. Woodhull's "free love." Mr. Voysey's views on religious freedom, undermining all established authority, appear to many good people to be the open door through which every conceivable immorality will stalk in to drag the race down to the pit. Suppose they say to him: "This is not what you want? Don't take us for fools. We know better. You do." How would he like it? For them to talk thus is a slight offence, since they do not profess "freedom," "reason," "private judgment." Mr. Voysey goes against his own "faith," and sets up an orthodoxy of morals quite as arbitrary and dogmatic as any churchman defends in religion. Will he not mend his spirit, and thereby improve his argument? S. H. MORSE.

THE ALTERNATIVES—FREE LOVE OR ENFORCED LUST.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Dogmatic assumption finds favor with the ignorant and bigoted. I do not believe either of these classes is largely represented among the patrons of THE INDEX, and therefore that the "London Letter" does not represent the views of any considerable number of them.

A clear statement of principles or a well-considered argument, for or against, on any question, merits attention; but an article so arrogant in temper and offensive in tone as the one in question deserves contempt only. Under ordinary circumstances I should take no notice of it; but as it has appeared in THE INDEX without comment, I feel that I ought to correct the false impression such negative endorsement may convey.

To the query, "Are we men or are we beasts?" I reply that women who believe in the right to self-ownership do not intend to remain subject "to the wild indulgence of the most imperious of our passions." Woman has suffered too long and too severely from such indulgence, and she now asks to be emancipated. She demands the restoration to herself of the supreme control of her sexual functions, so long delegated to man by marriage. She is determined to rise to the level of the female brute, as sovereign in the domain of sex, so that, if men have "veins full of warm blood," they may not be able to assuage the fever through her debauchery.

It is not strange that men cannot conceive "the sex" as independent of them for support. They doubtless imagine that women always will look, as they always have looked, to them for maintenance. But this is a mistake. As fast as women wake up to the fact that to marry for a home or for support is not a whit better than prostitution,—indeed, that it is prostitution,—they will demand and receive employment by which to take care of themselves.

In the blind idolatry that has been given to marriage, the most important thing of all has been neglected. In the strife to keep "one and one" tied together, their offspring are forgotten. Now, in the name of common sense, which is the more vital question: that of legal marriage regardless of results, or that of having the proper kind of children? Christianity has held to the former, until the world is almost ruined, sexually and physically. It has endeavored to save souls by damning bodies. My doctrine is precisely the reverse of this—is to save bodies, and the souls cannot be damned. But I see clearly, in the near future, that the question to be asked of mothers will be: "What is the status, physically, mentally, and morally, of your child?" and not: "Who is its father?" In preserving the form of marriage, its spirit has been quenched.

I am laboring for the birth of proper children. Such must be rightly conceived, and not subjected to the influence of legal lust during the period of gestation. If no children were to be born for the next generation except those desired by mothers (and under free love there could be no others), there would be a renovation of the world, physically and morally. As it is, four in five of those born are not wanted; and what is worse still is that mothers do everything they know how to do to kill them in their wombs. Is it to be wondered at that murder stalks through society, when so many children are born with the brand of Cain upon them? A mother cannot think of murdering her unborn child without affecting it for ill.

When woman is no longer forced into pregnancy,—when it shall be hers to determine when she shall become pregnant,—there will be no more murderers, no more drunkards, no more criminals of any kind born. Men should think of the ends to be gained before making a sweeping condemnation of the means, and should be careful of their charges against persons who are demanding freedom for woman sexually, as these means, rather than wantonly to brand them as advocating debauchery.

To me, free love means no more children than such as mothers desire, in advance of conception, to have; no more prostitution; no more enforced or legal intercourse; it means purity, health, and virtue, voluntarily on the part of woman, and through her necessarily for man. And I know it means the same to all genuine free-lovers. Nor can all the vulgar abuse of all the rest of the world make it mean anything else.

These, then, are "the retrograde views," the "insane waste of breath and energy;" these are "not to know the real feelings that lurk behind the cry for free love,"—"not to be able to guess what she is driving at," "going backward from all moral conquest to the laxity of savages,"—"to be pushed over the precipice before they are aware of the danger,"—"a wide leap backward,"—"to embrace bestiality,"—"to poison the air with nasty theories,"—for "adulteresses to glory in their shame." For woman to achieve and maintain freedom is to be all these, is it? So says Charles Voysey; but so say not I. As against my sex, I hurl the base insult in the teeth of its utterer.

There are but two alternatives between which the world can choose — free love and enforced lust. Which will ye have?

VICTORIA C. WOODHULL.

[It is necessary to say that the publication of editorial contributions "without comment" by the editor is neither positive nor "negative endorsement" on his part. It is mutually understood that the editorial contributors of THE INDEX shall write exclusively on their own responsibility; we have reserved no right to reject in whole or in part what they may choose to send, so long as they remain editorial contributors at all. With regard to publishing occasional contributions from other writers, we exercise the usual editorial right of acceptance or rejection; but even in this case the absence of comment is no indication whatever of our own views. By the standing rule of this paper, each writer is responsible alone for what he writes, except so far as the mere opportunity of being heard is concerned. If we make a note, it is only because we wish to say something on the same matter. It is true that we know of no other paper conducted on such a plan; but we hope that repeated statement will at last make our own plan understood.

Having, therefore, no right of rejection in the case of editorial contributions, we feel no obligation to give up the remaining space in our columns to any controversies they may naturally provoke. But we judge it to be fair in this case to give Mrs. Woodhull a hearing, and then, so far as we are concerned, to let the subject rest for the present. Mr. Voysey has expressed his opinion of "free love," and Mrs. Woodhull has expressed hers; and we hope that both will now be satisfied. If, as may happen by-and-by, we should be desirous to express our own definite views on this topic, it will be in an independent and purely impersonal form, and not in a mere note suggested in this manner.—ED.]

FREE SPEECH ON SUNDAY.

It appears from a statement in the Investigator of the 8th instant that a regular Sunday meeting for free discussion of theology, religion, and other matters of interest was begun in Winchester Hall, Purchase Street, in 1840, "by infidels and such liberal Christians as were friendly to free thought and free speech." I know of no such meeting of earlier date, and it looks as if the infidels must have the credit of the first movement in this very important direction. Their priority in taking this stand seems the more probable, as it accords with the sentiment of the motto inscribed over the desk where, at a still earlier date, Abner Kneeland used to preach on Sunday mornings, namely: "He who will not reason is a bigot; he who dares not reason is a coward; he who cannot reason is a fool."

I write to inform you of the next movement for free speech on Sundays after this, as far as Boston is concerned. This was a course of free Sunday morning lectures, to be followed by conversation or discussion, at the pleasure of the men and women who attended them. These lectures were held in Amory Hall, up two flights of stairs, at the corner of West and Washington Streets, and were established by persons who did not value church ceremonies of public worship, but who wished rather that which was recommended by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (x., 24, 25)—mutual exhortation and instruction; exhorting one another, to provoke unto love and to good works; to which these people added the exposure and rebuke of popular errors and sins which were left unrebuked by the clergy and the churches.

I don't remember whether any of the people who called themselves "infidels" were movers in the enterprise last mentioned. Most, certainly, if not all its originators, were people who thought the words Christian and Christianity susceptible of a better meaning than that given them by the clergy and the churches. They therefore procured the well-known abolitionist, Charles C. Burleigh, to open their enterprise by giving three lectures, on three successive Sunday mornings, in the place above named, inviting the public by advertisement in the daily papers. These lectures, given quite early in the year 1844, were on the following subjects:—

"Christianity, why called a Gospel?"

"Christianity, in relation to the treatment of enemies."

"Capital Punishment."

These three lectures were well attended, were exceedingly interesting, and were followed by free discussion on matters suggested by the discourse. At the close of the third lecture, one of the hearers proposed to the audience the inquiry whether it were not desirable to continue the arrangement, and have a lecture and discussion there weekly, by the best thinkers and speakers attainable, at least until the return of warm weather. The affirmative answer was so emphatic that the meetings were continued into the month of May. They would probably have been continued the following year, and thereafter, but then the ministry of Theodore Parker began, in which both free speech and free thought were as thoroughly represented as any one could desire.

A LETTER FROM MR. SARGENT.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Friend,—The following article was recently presented for publication to the Boston Evening Transcript, where it rightly belonged, being in answer to certain strictures and personalities relative to the Parker crisis, which appeared in that paper. But as the Transcript (with that timid policy of conservatism which seems to govern it) has peremptorily rejected the article, I will ask the favor of a place for it in your freer columns, and am truly yours,

JOHN T. SARGENT.

UNITARIANISM AND THEODORE PARKER IN THE CRISIS OF 1844.

An article, in the Transcript of the 16th instant, reviewing, at some length, Rev. O. B. Frothingham's recent fine Biography of Theodore Parker, has some personal references of so invidious a character as to require a few words in reply, at least so far as to ask an explanation. Alluding to the controversial excitement which, in 1844, grew out of pulpit exchanges between one of the, then, "Ministers at Large" and Mr. Parker, he being at that time a settled Unitarian minister in West Roxbury, and the writer of this (the "Minister at Large" referred to) being in the service of the so-called "Fraternity of Unitarian Churches in Boston," which took exception to this act of their minister, the writer in the Transcript affirms that the officials of said Fraternity had other reasons than those which Mr. Frothingham assigns for the course they took in protesting against the fellowship or recognition of Mr. Parker by their ministers.

The seeming personality of the Transcript article to which I now refer is in these words: "The officers of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches would, doubtless, state somewhat differently the reason and spirit of their course towards one of the ministers in their employ." If, by this, the writer means to insinuate that in the action of said Fraternity towards that Minister at Large there was aught of a personal nature apart from or independent of that breadth of pulpit tolerance and liberality which he so rightfully required of them as "Liberal" Christians, so-called; or if, by what the writer calls "the reason and spirit of their course" in that crisis, anything else be meant than their manifest disloyalty to the great principle of the "largest liberty,"—then I challenge him to be more explicit in the revelation of the secret he seems thus to intimate. Certain it is that, immediately after my exchange with Parker and the exclusive action of the Unitarians in consequence thereof, the public sympathy and sentiment of Boston were unequivocal as to his right and claim to be heard; for he was at once called to the city as by acclamation of a great popular gathering pledging him the support and tolerance under which, by the blessing of God thus far, his influence has continued to be felt. Nor is this all; for we have lived to see, as it were, the fulfilment of predictions to which, in the height of that controversy with the Fraternity, we gave such expression as this: "The course of Unitarianism is suicidal just so far as it compromises freedom of opinion or freedom of the pulpit." "It will bleed to death, if there be any blood in it, by the rash excision of Theodore Parker." Those timid Unitarians were further admonished that it ill became them (notorious infidels as they were to all the rest of the Christian world) to stigmatize one of the wisest and most progressive men among them as an infidel, or to close their church doors against him; and, if it had really come to that, my relations to them might as well cease, for none other than a free pulpit could I occupy. Not having considered it my special mission to make "Unitarians" only of the poor to whom I was ministering, I had freely and constantly proffered the privilege of pulpit exchange to all the ministers of every other denomination both in the city and out of it (not excepting the Catholics); and if, by any reserve of theirs, this reciprocity of exchange was declined, I no less freely offered them the privilege of my pulpit for a third service in the evening. With this breadth of purpose in my ministry, I could see no good reason for exceptional exclusion of Theodore Parker, of whom it may truly be said—"The people heard him gladly." That the Unitarians would come to regret their injudicious and exclusive course, I felt well assured, and so forewarned them; and not a few of them, since that eventful crisis, have said, "Ah well! we made a great mistake!" Of course they did, and they see it now and feel it, if not in the consciousness of their disloyalty to a great principle, at least in the experience and conviction that it has hurt the social relations and credit of Unitarianism as a liberal system, and reduced its denominational force; for although it may be and is true that "liberal principles," on the whole, are largely on the advance, in these days, it surely is not through the influence of Unitarianism as a system, but rather by the stimulus of influences outside of it or seceding from it, such as RADICAL CLUBS and FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATIONS.

JOHN T. SARGENT.

THE CATHOLIC PRIEST'S LETTER.

NEW YORK, April, 1874.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I was highly gratified at the contents of a letter in your issue for April 9, which appears without signature, but is stated to be from the pen of a learned and sincere priest of the Catholic Church. I say I was gratified, because the writer appears as liberal and humane as he is learned and sincere. In that letter the writer says plainly that those who, without any fault, are convinced that theirs is the true religion, and serve God in justice, are to be reckoned amongst the members of the true Church, etc.

If these are the real, genuine teachings of the Catholic Church of the present day, then it has either undergone a most radical renovation, or it is in contradiction with itself.

What it taught in former times may be gathered from the following facts. At the conversion of the Protestants in Hungary, the converts were required to take the following oath:—

"We swear and confess that the doctrine of the Church of Rome is the catholic, pure, divine, saving, old, and true doctrine; but the Protestant is false, erroneous, blasphemous, accursed, heretical, damning, seditious, ungodly, etc. Hence we curse (maledictos pronuntiamus) our parents, who educated us in the heretical faith. We curse also those who raised in our minds any doubts of the Roman Catholic faith. We curse the books which we have read, and which contain those heretical and blasphemous doctrines. We curse, also, all the works we read whilst we lived in the heretical faith, that we may not be answerable for them before God at the last day. We moreover swear, as long as a drop of blood remains in our veins, to pursue the accursed Protestant faith in every way, secretly and openly, with force and fraud (clam et aperte, violenter et fraudulenter), with word and deed, yea, even with the sword." (Authentic History of the Professio Fidei Tridentinæ, by J. F. Mohnicke.)

The prelates assembled at the Council of Trent closed their deliberations by pronouncing the following curse, at the suggestion of the presiding officer, the Cardinal de Lorraine, who cried out, "Curse all heretics," all the bishops responding with one voice, "Curse, curse, curse":—

"We excommunicate and curse, in the name of Almighty God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and in the name of the apostles Peter and Paul and our own . . . . all Lutherans, Zwinglians, Calvinists, Anabaptists, etc.; all apostates from the Christian faith, as well as all other heretics, whatever they may call themselves; and also those who believe them, receive them, patronize and defend them; all those who read their books without our permission, or keep, print, and defend them, for whatever reason it may be, publicly or privately, whatever may be the pretext or design; also all schismatics and those who through obstinacy withdraw their allegiance from us. (The Bull in Cœna Domini.)

So much for the past; now for the present:—

"Before God, no man has any right to be of any religion but the Catholic." (Catholic World, April, 1870.)

"Citizens who have no religion have no conscience that persons who have religion are bound to respect." (Ibid.)

"The God of Protestantism is one of the devils; a dirty devil." (Freeman's Journal.)

And this is enough for the present. The writer of the letter alluded to concludes in the following words: "If there is something yet not satisfactorily explained, I shall find pleasure in endeavoring to supply the defect." Now what I should consider a favor conferred on your readers would be an explanation as to the way of reconciling the liberal views of the reverend writer with those of the Catholic Church—with the teachings of that same Church, as exhibited in the extracts and documents quoted.

"THE SOUL FIRST OF ALL."

MR. ABBOT:—

Although a constant reader of THE INDEX, I have heretofore refrained from offering any contributions to its columns, because I thought the pages of a paper characterized by so high an order of thought could be more acceptably occupied by writers possessing more culture than I can lay claim to. I trust, however, that you will bear with me while I make a few inquiries.

For fifteen years I have been groping my way through a labyrinth of metaphysical mysticisms. My little bark has been tossed upon the troubled sea of speculative philosophy, but at last, like Noah's dove, I found a resting place for the sole of my foot,—a corner-stone upon which I might erect the superstructure of a rational faith. I mean the "scientific method." I fondly imagined that it was the duty of every sincere inquirer after truth to collect all the facts possible, compare, arrange, and classify the same with the utmost care before attempting any generalization; and where complex phenomena present themselves, to analyze them completely before attempting any synthesis, and to accept as true that which was scientifically demonstrated to be true, and to accept that also which has a large preponderance of evidence in its favor, at least until it is disproved. But now comes the author of The Bible of the Ages (Mr. G. B. Stebbins), who, in an article entitled "The Soul First of All," tells us "the truth within must take place of this idolatry of authority without." This "truth within" he defines to be "intuition," and calls it the "true method."

Now if this be so, then am I again—

> "A thousand miles away from shore, > Without a rudder, sail, or oar."

Can it be that observation, experience, and induction are not to be depended upon; that reason and knowledge are, and must be, subordinate to a higher law, a truer method? Are the indefatigable labors and careful deductions of Tyndall, Carpenter, Huxley, Darwin, and Agassiz to go for naught, if they do not happen to "verify" these "voices from the inner temple"? Mr. Stebbins says: "All that is in the Infinite Spirit is in the spirit of man, less in degree and scope, but the same in kind;" by which it would appear that the souls of men are emanations from the Deity. Again: "Before experience was, were these interior realities, these truths of the soul." So our ideas are innate, and it is the business of reason and experience to verify them. Truly, Mr. Stebbins is sufficiently orthodox to satisfy the most exacting! But, before I conclude to return to my wallowing in the theological mire, I would like by your permission to ask him a few questions:—

1. If "soul is first of all," and existed in the Deity from eternity, how are souls multiplied as men multiply? Did they exist in indefinite numbers "first of all," or are they created as occasion requires?

2. What is "soul"?

3. If ideas are "innate," how comes it that hereditary predisposition, observation, experience, reason, and education make the man?

4. If inspiration and intuition are the true sources of truth, how is it that they do not agree? For instance, Moses under the guiding power of inspiration said: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." (Exodus, xxii., 18.) Also, "Slay every man his brother, and every man his companion," etc. (Exodus, xxxii., 27.) Again, St. Paul says, "If women would learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home." (I. Corinthians, xiv., 34, 35. See also I. Timothy, ii., 11, 12.)

Do these and many similar inspired declarations harmonize with our innate ideas of love, justice, etc.?

If Mr. Stebbins will deign to answer these inquiries, I may have something further to offer on the subject. Meanwhile I will comfort myself with the belief that "reason is the highest and best standard or guide we possess."

Anxiously yours, HARRY HOOVER.

ANECDOTE OF PROFESSOR AGASSIZ.

"Since his death, Professor Agassiz has been much and ardently lauded as a Christian scientist, and a champion of the faith against scientific scepticism." So we are told by the editor of the Popular Science Monthly, in a recent number of that "indispensable" magazine (according to Henry Ward Beecher).

In this connection, I am induced to relate a brief conversation which, although occurring many years ago, made so deep an impression on me that I remember every word of it.

In company with a friend, now well known to fame, M. D. Conway (then a student of divinity at Cambridge), I attended a geological lecture of the eminent professor, and afterward spent a delightful hour with him at his office. The conversation turning upon the subject of the recent lecture, Mr. Conway inquired if the professor attempted to reconcile the views therein expressed with the statements of the first chapter of Genesis. He replied that the Bible was not held up now as an authority in science, but as a rule of faith and practice. "And do you regard it," inquired my friend, "as an infallible guide in those matters?" "Oh," said Agassiz, with an arch look at the divinity student, "as to questions of that sort, it is your business, not mine, to interpret. But," resuming a serious air, and with that beautiful foreign accent of his, "if any man shall say that we have a better guide here" (laying his hand impressively on his breast) "than any book, I shall not contradict him."

HOW THEY LOVE ONE ANOTHER.—The Methodist on Close Communion.—The downfall of a dogma so repugnant to the spirit of Christianity and the age, so inconsistent with American thought and feeling, so hostile to the principles of freedom on which the Baptist organization is built, was inevitable. It could be held up at all only by prejudice and a temporary sectarian excitement. The intelligence and energy of the Baptist people, combined with the influence of their earnest disposition to coöperate with men of other denominations in practical Christian work, may be relied upon to cause a speedy extinction of this most offensive dogma.

The Baptist Examiner on the Methodist.—If there is one evangelical denomination that went beyond every other in exclusiveness; that will go farther than any other to make one proselyte; that more uniformly than any other centres what is called "patronage," in the broadest sense of the word, on itself—then the Methodist denomination was that one. It seems very queer, that Baptists should be scolded for illiberality. But we will give him one fact for his personal meditation. We assert that Dr. Crooks has more fingers and toes than American Baptists, with nearly 12,000 ministers, have of pastors who hanker for the reign of open-communionism in their churches.

Wrote Edmund Burke: "Nothing has driven people more into infidelity than the mutual hatred of Christian denominations."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25	"	8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"	6	"	"
" 52	"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

CIRCULATE! Circulate!! Circulate THOSE PETITIONS. Don't feel satisfied when your petition is a yard long, unless you have asked every one to sign it. Get good, influential names.

GET EVERYBODY.

Don't neglect to show the petition to any one, because he is a stockholder in some church, or other exempted property, as many such persons admit the justice of the demand; and those who will not should be made to take the responsibility of refusing to sign it.

Don't delay! We want the petitions returned early.

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

Sent, postage prepaid, on receipt of price

SABBATH SCHOOL SONG BOOK!

Triumphant Success of the New and Beautiful Sabbath-school Song Book, the RIVER OF LIFE!!

BY H. S. PERKINS AND W. W. BENTLEY.

This undoubtedly fine book has been but a short time before the public, and the public is already convinced of its surpassing merit. Witness the great sales—many thousands. Witness the decided words of praise from hundreds of Sabbath-school workers in all directions.

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Superintendent in Charleston, S.C., says: "We pronounce it the best book we have ever used."

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Clergyman in Philadelphia is "Greatly pleased with it."

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Secretary of a Sabbath School Union, in Illinois, believes it "Surpasses any other I have examined."

These are but a few out of a multitude of commendations.

No book of the kind issued for many years has given greater or more universal satisfaction.

Specimen Copies mailed, post-paid, for 30 cents. Price by the Hundred Copies, $30. Sold by all dealers.

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY
SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

BOSTON, Sept. 1, 1873.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

A SERIES of interesting papers on Charles Sumner, written by M. D. Conway, has appeared in the London Examiner.

THE TITLE of one of Gerald Massey's lectures, which he has been delivering in this country, is: "Why does not God kill the Devil?" We supposed he had, long ago.

THERE ARE many definitions of what constitutes a Christian, but we think none could be more Orthodox than that which Rev. Dr. Hill (Unitarian), of Portland, Maine, gave to a friend of ours the other day. "No man is a Christian," said Dr. Hill, "who does not believe in the perfect authority of Christ."

MR. AUSTIN HOLYOAKE—brother of George Jacob Holyoake, and, like that distinguished gentleman, a prominent Freethinker and Atheist—died in London, April 10, aged forty-seven years. He was a man of high and irreproachable character, and of good ability. He held to his atheistic belief to the end, but died with calmness and resignation.

THE FOLLOWING language was used by Mr. C. C. Burleigh, in the dedicatory services of Cosmian Hall, Florence, Mass.: "So we dedicate our house to the service of truth and right; to freedom of intellect and conscience; to the highest Ideal of God in the mind and soul of each." If every church should be so dedicated, we could not have too many of them.

SENECA, the Roman philosopher, contemporaneous with St. Paul, is one of the prophets of the discovery of America, whom Mr. Sumner quotes. Seneca's words, in his Medea, are thus translated by Whately: "There shall come a time, in later ages, when ocean shall relax his claims, and a vast continent appear, and a pilot shall find new worlds, and Thule shall be no more the earth's bounds."

A POET says:—

"We gather shells from youth to age,
And then we leave them like a child."

We leave behind us what becomes foreign to us—what we outgrow. The constant and faithful soul does no more; it carries with it forever what remains of it, and neither time nor change can loose its hold of what it loves and owns.

FOR THE first time in the history of the country, a negro occupied the chair of the Speaker of the national House of Representatives, one day last week, when the House was in Committee of the Whole. The colored member, so distinguished, was the Hon. Mr. Rainey of South Carolina. Democrats and Republicans, Northerners and Southerners, alike expressed their hearty satisfaction at the manner of Mr. Rainey's bearing as temporary Speaker.

THE Morning Star (Baptist) says: "It will be only a question of time and use to decide how signally true it is that Christianity is not a failure, THE INDEX to the contrary notwithstanding." Certainly, "time and use" must decide whether Christianity is a failure or not. The opinion of THE INDEX, in this case as in every other, is only good so far as it goes. It does not claim to be infallible. It but announces its judgment, and gives its reasons therefor. But it may be mistaken. We can afford to wait and see.

THE Jewish Times, which, by the way, is an interesting and able paper, utters itself in the following very sensible and liberal strain:—

Not as Jews, but as citizens of an enlightened age; as men who feel in accord with the aspirations of humanity at large; who stand above the narrow pent-up churches that hold forth one dogma or other as the shibboleth of admission to God's presence,—must we bend our energies to help pull down the sectarian barriers. We must confine sect and creed to the church, the temple, the mosque; we must assist in delivering art, science, culture, from the chains of sectarianism; we must proclaim again and again that society deals only, and can deal only, with the moral man, not with the member of this or that church.

A YOUNG MEN'S Hebrew Association has been formed recently in New York. Its specific aims are the establishment of a reading room and library; lectures on historical, scientific, literary, and social topics; entertainments of a social, artistic, and musical nature; the establishment of free classes for general instruction; the organization of a bureau for securing employment for deserving young men. It will be seen that this is not designed to be a sectarian Association, like the Young Men's Christian Association, but a human one. We wish for it success and prosperity, and are glad to see our Hebrew friends coming to the front with such notable and praiseworthy enterprises as they have of late embarked upon.

"BROTHER" BEECHER was talking about the Trinity, a few evenings since, in his conference meeting; and, as his mind seemed to be cloudy on the subject (although he had declared his acceptance of the dogma), he was questioned somewhat by the brethren. Brother Halliday, his colleague, asked: "What do you suppose is meant by Christ's declaration, that he was one with the Father?" Mr. Beecher—"I don't know." (Laughter.) Brother Halliday—"Don't know what you suppose?" Mr. Beecher—"I don't suppose at all. . . . It is a great deal easier to say you don't know, when you once get used to it, than to say you do, and try to explain what you can't explain." Mr. Beecher puts himself on the safe side or both sides of the fence (if that is possible), by saying that he believes, and then, in the same breath, saying that he doesn't know whereof he believes.

IN AN interesting article on Female Poets, the London Examiner says: "We do not venture to assert that examples of the genus have been very numerous, or that they have often ranked with the foremost men; but we do maintain that, among the true poets of the world, women have been and more frequently may be numbered." It mentions Miriam and Deborah as the earliest female poets; speaks of the "divinity of the genius" of Sappho; and ends with Mrs. Browning, of whom it says: "We doubt if any in our own day or age has touched a harp at once so sweet, so strong, so heart-rending and heart-devouring as hers." The Examiner thinks that "the genius of women has hitherto for the most part been confined to an unhealthy growth in the dark," and believes that "we must give it the full light of day, before we can lay down the limits of its capabilities."

THE EULOGISTIC ORATION on Charles Sumner, pronounced by Carl Schurz in the Boston Music Hall, last week Wednesday, was most noble and fitting in every respect. Both the head and the heart of the orator dictated its every word. It was not undiscriminating and fulsome, but just, loving, and true. Massachusetts, we think, hung her head with sorrowful shame as she listened to the eloquent rebuke of Mr. Schurz for the censure she gave her great Senator for his conscientious and magnanimous action in regard to the national battle-flag inscriptions. That Sumner did not die before his State had recalled her hasty and disgraceful condemnation of him was alike his and her most happy fortune. Grand lessons of wisdom and virtue, we trust, will accrue to our people from the life of the illustrious dead, and from this vivid and masterly portrait of him sketched by the illustrious living.

Compulsory Education.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION OF THE NEW YORK CITY COUNCIL OF POLITICAL REFORM.

In a democratic republic like ours, where all political power resides in and springs from the people; where, to use the language of Abraham Lincoln, "the government is of the people, for the people, and by the people,"—no subject can be presented to the citizens for their consideration more important than the education of the youth.

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION ESSENTIAL TO FREE GOVERNMENT.

Intelligence in the rulers is essential to good government; with us the rulers are the voters, hence the necessity of fitting them by education to rule. With intelligent voters, our form of government is the best yet devised; but with ignorant voters, it is one of the worst. An intelligent people seek freedom, and an ignorant one despotism, just as naturally and certainly as the needle points to the magnetic pole.

The founders of our free institutions two hundred and fifty years ago saw this, and scarcely had they completed the log cabins for their families, when they began the log schoolhouse for the school and schoolmaster.

The schoolhouse has spread, developed, and improved from Maine to California equally with the dwelling-house. It is the nursery of American citizens.

THREE CARDINAL PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN LIBERTY.

These three cardinal principles our forefathers never lost sight of: namely, a free State, a free School, and a free Church. Self-preservation imposes upon our government the duty of educating the people sufficiently to qualify them to exercise intelligently the right of suffrage. Conscious of this, every free State established a system of free schools.

So great and beneficent has been their influence upon the people, that the material prosperity, intellectual and moral development, respect for law and obedience to it, in each State, may be relatively measured and calculated by the condition of the free public schools.

WHAT THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT IS DOING FOR EDUCATION.

The national government has already set aside for educational purposes one hundred and forty millions (140,000,000) of acres of public land; and the question of devoting to education the whole proceeds of the public lands still undisposed of is discussed. In the last Congress, the Committee on Education and Labor in the House of Representatives reported favorably a bill for this purpose, and, after a careful debate and consideration, it passed that body and was sent to the Senate. It has established a Bureau of Education as a permanent part of the government, with a Commissioner of Education at its head. His annual report is one of the most interesting, instructive, valuable, and important documents that issues from the government press. Every legislator and every school officer in the United States should study its contents and heed its facts.

MAGNITUDE OF THE SCHOOL INTEREST.

(1.)—In the Nation.

We have in the United States over fourteen and a half millions (14,500,000) of children of the school age; we expend annually for schools over ninety-five millions ($95,000,000) of dollars, which is equal to one-third of one per cent. of the value of the property, real and personal, of the whole country, as returned by the last census; and we employ two hundred and twenty-one thousand (221,000) teachers. This is our standing army, and those are our raw recruits. Their arms are the pen and the slate pencil; their munitions of war the text-books; their forts and arsenals the schoolhouses; and the enemy they are enlisted to conquer, ignorance and bigotry. Through the munificence of the government, the finest building that springs up in every village in our new States and Territories is the public schoolhouse. Like the light of heaven and the water of the earth, it is open and free alike to rich and poor.

(2.)—In the State of New York.

In the State of New York we have one million and a half (1,500,000) school children, twenty-eight thousand (28,000) school teachers, twelve thousand (12,000) schoolhouses, and one million (1,000,000) volumes of books in the school district libraries. The school property of the State is worth twenty-four millions of dollars ($24,000,000,) and we are expending two million dollars ($2,000,000) a year to add to it and improve it. The law in the State of New York requires us to raise annually one and one-quarter of a mill tax upon each dollar of valuation of taxable property, for the support of the free schools. This amounts to two and a half millions of dollars. But so fully is the value of the schools appreciated that the people voluntarily tax themselves annually four times this amount, making the whole sum spent upon schools in this State ten millions of dollars ($10,000,000) a year.

This is called the "Empire State," So long as we continue this liberal policy of education for the whole people it will remain such.

The canal interest, the railroad interest, the manufacturing interest, important as they are to material progress, are yet small compared with the education of our million and a half of youth.

(3.)—In the City of New York.

The city of New York had, last year, over two hundred and thirty thousand (230,000) pupils in its schools. It employed three thousand (3,000) teachers and school officers, and expended upon public education three millions three hundred thousand dollars ($3,300,000). The citizen, however humble, has only to send his child to the public school, and government furnishes him there, free of cost, an educational palace, warmed and lighted, the best text-books and apparatus, and the most skilful teachers.

Stewart and Astor, with their hundred millions of property and no children in the public schools, like true-hearted American citizens, gladly pay the school taxes that educate the sons and daughters of thousands of poor laborers who have no property to be taxed. Aided by the free school, the greatest wealth and the highest honors and offices in this broad land are within the reach of the sons of the humblest workman.

THE PROPERTY SHOULD EDUCATE THE CHILDREN.

The American doctrine is, that "the property of the State shall educate the children of the State." This benefits equally the rich and the poor. It decreases crime, reduces taxes, improves labor, increases the value of property, and elevates the whole community. One of the first and decisive questions asked in seeking a permanent location for one's family is: What are the means provided for education? A village, town, or State, with good free schools, is the resort of families; without them it is the home of criminals.

In this city, it costs more to support police and police courts to restrain and punish a few thousand criminals, nearly all of whom became such from want of education, than to educate our 230,000 children.

CRIME THE CONSEQUENCE OF IGNORANCE.

In France, from 1867 to 1869, one-half the inhabitants could neither read nor write; and this one-half furnished ninety-five per cent. of the persons arrested for crime, and eighty-seven per cent. of those convicted. In other words, an ignorant person, on the average, committed seven times the number of crimes that one not ignorant did.

In the six New England States of our own country, only seven per cent. of the inhabitants, above the age of ten years, can neither read nor write; yet eighty per cent. of the crime in those States is committed by this small minority; in other words, a person there without education commits fifty-three times as many crimes as one with education.

In New York and Pennsylvania an ignorant person commits on the average seven times the number of crimes that one who can read and write commits, and in the whole United States the illiterate person commits ten times the number of crimes that the educated one does.

The above facts are derived from official statistics.

THE SCHOOL THE PREVENTIVE OF CRIME.

We may have supposed that it is the churches rather than the schools that prevent people from becoming criminals; but the facts indicated by statistics collected by government show the contrary.

The kingdom of Bavaria examined this question in 1870. In Upper Bavaria there were 15 churches and 5 1-2 schoolhouses to each one thousand buildings, and 667 crimes to each one hundred thousand inhabitants. In Upper Franconia the ratio was 5 churches, 7 schoolhouses, and 444 crimes. In Lower Bavaria the ratio was 10 churches and 4 1-2 schoolhouses and 870 crimes. In the Palatinate the ratio was 4 churches, 11 schoolhouses and only 425 crimes, or less than one-half. In the Lower Palatinate the ratio was 11 churches, 6 schoolhouses, and 690 crimes, while in Lower Franconia the ratio was 5 churches, 10 schoolhouses, and only 384 crimes.

Tabulated for clearness of comparison, it is as follows:—

	Per 1,000 Buildings.		Per 100,000 Souls.
	Churches.	School Houses.	Crimes.
Upper Bavaria	15	5 1-2	667
Upper Franconia	5	7	444
Lower Bavaria	10	4 1-2	870
The Palatinate	4	11	425
Lower Palatinate	11	6	690
Lower Franconia	5	10	384

In short, it seems that crime decreases almost in the same ratio that schools increase, while more or less churches seem in Bavaria to produce very little effect upon it.

Those unerring guides of the statesman—statistics—demonstrate that the most economical, effective, and powerful preventive of crime is the free common school. Universal education tends to universal morality.

THE SCHOOL THE PREVENTIVE OF PAUPERISM.

An examination of the statistics of England, Scotland, Ireland, and of the different countries of Europe, indicate that, other things being equal, pauperism is in the inverse ratio of the education of the mass of the people; that is, as education increases, pauperism decreases, and as education decreases, pauperism increases. The same rule holds good in our country.

Taking the three States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois for illustration, we find that of the illiterate persons one in ten is a pauper; while of the rest of the population only one in three hundred is a pauper. In other words, a given number of persons suffered to grow up in ignorance furnish on the average thirty times as many paupers as the same persons would if required to get such an education as our free public schools afford. Add to this that they furnish also ten times the number of criminals, and the right as well as the duty of government, as the protector of society, to enforce general education is clear, for it is the plain obligation of government to protect society against pauperism and crime.

EDUCATION, THEN, SHOULD BE COMPULSORY.

Government should prevent both crime and pauperism by extirpating the cause of each; to wit, ignorance. An educated citizen is of more value to himself, to society, and to the country than an ignorant one.

An examination covering prominent points or centres of labor in twenty States, made three years ago, developed the fact that even such education as our free common schools afford adds on the average fifty per cent. to the producing capacity of the citizen; while a higher training increases it two or three hundred per cent.

He can do more and better work, from the street scavenger up to the most skilled mechanic, with the same expenditure of time and force, from the mere fact of possessing knowledge.

A well-educated commonwealth, however narrow its borders or poor its soil, soon becomes rich and powerful; while an ignorant one, even under the happiest circumstances of land and sky, falls a prey to anarchy, poverty, and despotism.

Government is making ample provision for the secular education of all. Has it not a right, then, to require all to be educated, either in the public schools at public expense, or in private schools at private expense? We think it has, and that secular education sufficient for the common affairs of every-day life, and to enable the citizen to vote with intelligence, should be compulsory.

Prussia and many other German States have tried it for years, with the happiest results. It is her vigorous system of compulsory education that in sixty years has raised her from a bankrupt and conquered petty kingdom to the ruling empire of Europe, and made her the seat and home of intelligence, industry, and wealth. Boston has had such a law for twenty years, and in the last ten they have reduced truancy from school sixty per cent. New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Michigan have now adopted it. England has given her school boards power to adopt it, and in London they have. The effect is to increase the attendance at school, and decrease the number of juvenile delinquents. The time has arrived to try the experiment in the cities of our State at least, if not in the whole State. This will cause every child to enjoy the benefits of the public school, or of some private school.

Wherever compulsory attendance has been tried long enough to determine its effect, the result has been so satisfactory that it has become a fixed and settled policy. Prussia, Saxony, and democratic Switzerland testify to its excellence. It is in harmony with the true spirit of a democratic republic to require every citizen to qualify himself for the right of suffrage, and for earning an independent living.

The taxpayers who furnish the money to educate all the people have a right to require that all shall be educated, in order that crime and pauperism, and the public burdens caused by the same, may be reduced to a minimum, and the ballot wielded only by intelligent voters.

The ballot, in the hands of a corrupt and ignorant populace, is the torch of the political incendiary; but with an intelligent people is the bulwark of liberty.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." It costs far less to prevent crime, pauperism, and civil commotions, by educating the whole people, than it does to punish criminals, support paupers, and maintain armies to repress an ignorant and vicious population.

The average daily attendance in this State upon the public schools during the school year is only about one-third of the whole school population; and upon all schools, public and private, it is only about one-half.

The class most in need of school training seldom attend school at all; to wit, those whose parents, through ignorance, poverty, avarice, or crime, give them little or no home education. This class can be reached only by the aid of a compulsory and searching statute. Every other remedy has been tried without curing the disease.

By a judicious law, firmly but kindly enforced, compelling attendance during school hours upon some school, either public or private, the streets of our large cities could be cleared of the thousands of youthful vagrants from whose ranks now our army of criminals is almost entirely recruited. Such a law in a single generation would work a moral and intellectual reformation and regeneration of our criminal and pauper classes, and save millions of money in the departments of police, charities, and corrections, and largely increase the wealth, influence, and producing power of the State.

The wisdom of developing and perfecting our free schools is admitted by the great majority of the community. A small minority oppose them on the ground that their religion is not specially and authoritatively taught therein.

OUR GOVERNMENT CANNOT AND SHOULD NOT TEACH RELIGION.

Our government cannot give religious education; because while protecting each citizen in the undisturbed enjoyment of his own religion, as a sacred matter between him and his Maker, and thus tolerating all religions. it has none of its own, and cannot favor any sect or denomination or class.

The whole letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, as well as of the several States, prohibits the establishment either directly or indirectly of a State religion; or the showing any favor or giving any protection, privileges, or financial support to one religious sect more than to another. Protection to all equally, but support to none, is, on this point, the organic law of America.

If the churches would not interfere with the government's secular education, but would devote the whole of their strength to giving, in their own places and manner, religious education, they and the government, though working in different spheres and in different buildings, would act in entire harmony, and would in the end produce the best possible general result. By simply protecting religion, but not teaching it, government is, as matter of fact, giving the utmost genuine vitality and strength to the religious element.

BUT ONE SECT OPPOSED TO FREE SCHOOLS.

This American doctrine of free non-sectarian schools is substantially accepted and adopted by all religious sects save one. That one, however, is large, enthusiastic, well drilled, and ably and powerfully led; and though its members are chiefly of foreign birth, yet, having become citizens, they are entitled to the same voice and rights and privileges as natives are in this matter. The leader of this sect, though a foreign ruler, has ordered the destruction of our free non-sectarian system of popular education, and the substitution of his own system of church or parochial schools; that is, schools whose text-books and teachers are selected, appointed, and controlled by the Church, though the State may be permitted to pay all the bills. In the city of New York, through State and municipal legislation, the following amounts of money were obtained in the last five years from the public treasury for sectarian institutions, such as churches, church schools, and church charities; namely:—

1869.....	$767,815	of which	this one sect	received	$651,191
1870.....	861,326	"	"	"	711,436
1871.....	634,088	"	"	"	552,718
1872.....	419,849	"	"	"	252,110
1873.....	324,284	"	"	"	306,193
Tot. 5 yrs.	$3,017,362	"	"	"	$2,473,648

If this is a better system than ours, we should adopt it, for we want the best; but if it is a worse, we should reject it.

THE PAROCHIAL SYSTEM PRODUCES MORE ILLITERATES, PAUPERS, AND CRIMINALS THAN OURS.

It has been tried for centuries; and in some countries, as Italy and Spain, under the most favorable auspices, for there this sect has had despotic power, both civil and religious, and so could carry its system out to its highest perfection.

What, then, are its fruits? We may say, its necessary and inevitable fruits? By its fruits it should be judged. They are as follows:—

(1.) A highly educated few; but among the masses general ignorance, instead of general enlightenment.

(2.) A low grade of morality.

(3.) A large pauper and criminal class.

(4.) A tendency to despotism and to official selfishness and corruption.

(5.) A lack of national progress and development.

These statements are made, first from a personal knowledge of the facts gained by investigation in those countries—having visited them before they rejected that system, for the purpose of studying this very question; and secondly, they are made from a careful analysis of official statistics.

The fruits of the two systems also exist side by side in our own country.

There are with us five and a half millions of foreign-born inhabitants, the greater portion of whom came from countries, as Ireland and England for example, that have had the parochial or church system of schools; hence they may justly be taken intellectually and morally as the fair average product of that method of education.

Of these the illiterates above the age of ten are fourteen per cent. (.14) of the whole number; the paupers are four and one-tenth per cent. (.041), and the criminals one and six-tenths per cent. (.016).

While, on the other hand, in the twenty-one of our States having the American system of non-sectarian free public schools, there is a native population of twenty millions. This native population has been educated in this system of schools, and in like manner may be justly taken, intellectually and morally, as the fair average product of this method of education.

Of these, the illiterates above the age of ten are only three and one-half per cent. (.035) of the whole number; the paupers only one and seven-tenths per cent. (.017), and the criminals only three-fourths of one per cent. (.0075).

In other words, from every ten thousand (10,000) inhabitants the parochial or church system of education turns out fourteen hundred (1400) illiterates, four hundred and ten (410) paupers, and one hundred and sixty (160) criminals; while the non-sectarian free public school system turns out only three hundred and fifty (350) illiterates, one hundred and seventy (170) paupers, and seventy-five (75) criminals. Or if we take Massachusetts by itself, which has the type or model of our free public school system, with its 1,104,032 native inhabitants, the number is still less; namely, seventy-one (71) illiterates, forty-nine (49) paupers, and eleven (11) criminals.

	Illiterates.	Paupers.	Criminals.	Inhabitants.
Parochial school system.....	1,400	410	160 to the	10,000
Pb'c school system in 21 States.	350	170	75 "	10,000
Public school system in Mass ..	71	49	11 "	10,000

That is, we are asked by these friends who have come here and joined us, and whose zeal and energy, if rightly directed, will be of great service both to themselves and the country, to abolish our own well-tried system of education, and adopt the one to which they, in their former homes, became accustomed; though that one, on the average, produces four times as many illiterates, two and a half times as many paupers, and more than twice as many criminals as ours. Or if we take Massachusetts as a fair sample of our system, we are asked to adopt one that will give society twenty times as many illiterates, eight times as many paupers, and fourteen times as many criminals.

We cannot do this, and when they come to understand thoroughly the facts they will not wish us to do it; for the welfare of their children is just as dear to them as that of ours is to us, and they, equally with us, desire to diminish ignorance, pauperism, and crime, and to make the country of their adoption and the home of their descendants intelligent, prosperous, powerful, and happy.

The whole future of our country and the very existence of our free government is wrapped up in the common school. Promote and develop that, and every department of industry and intelligence will flourish like a tree well watered and nourished at its roots. Destroy the common school, and ignorance, poverty, despotism, and bigotry will soon pervade the whole land.

Generalizations drawn like the above from the official statistics of twenty-five millions of people are unerring guides. They settle the question as to the comparative excellence of the two systems of education. They are intellectual, industrial, and moral beacons, that direct with certainty and safety the statesman and the philanthropist. They point out unmistakably to the legislator the duty of enacting a law requiring attendance upon schools, during the school age and the school terms, of all the children in the State, unless legally and for good and sufficient reasons temporarily excused.

The preservation of free government requires this. Protection of society against pauperism and crime demands it. The material development of our country calls for it. The success and happiness in life of the children of the poor, the ignorant, and the vicious can be secured only by such a statute.

Your committee recommend the passage of the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the Legislature should enact a law authorizing and empowering the school boards in each city, town, and incorporated village to require the attendance at some school, public or private, during the school terms and the school hours of each day, of all children between the ages of eight and fifteen years, unless for good and sufficient reason temporarily excused. DEXTER A. HAWKINS, Chairman of Committee on Education of the New York City Council of Political Reform.

NEW YORK, Dec. 30, 1873.

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS:

AN ARGUMENT FOR UNSECTARIAN EDUCATION BEFORE THE OLATHE (KANSAS) LITERARY SOCIETY, JAN. 12, 1874.

BY J. E. SUTTON.

In taking the affirmative of this question, let me first state that, if it were intended that the Protestant Bible should be read in our schools as a history of the Jewish people, and of their peculiar views on religion, and as a history of a noble Jewish reformer who was so faithful to his own convictions of right and duty that, like another Socrates, he died for what he believed to be the truth, then by all means let it be read; and side by side with it, let there be read the Koran, the Veda, and the Jewish Talmud. Let all these be studied as a part of history, showing the peculiar views on religion held by different races of mankind. It would be a wholesome exercise in the curriculum of historical studies, calculated to give broad and liberal views on true religion and morals, and would effectually shield our children from a narrow, sectarian spirit. It would teach them a religion embracing all humanity, and in harmony with universal progress.

But if it is intended that the Protestant Bible alone shall be read, in all the schools, as the only infallible text-book of divine revelation on religion and morals, excluding all other Bibles, then most emphatically I would object, on the grounds that it would be unjust, unphilosophical, and unscientific.

It would be unjust to the Catholics (outnumbering the Protestants two to one), who would want the Douay Bible for their children; to the Jew, who would prefer the Talmud; to the Unitarian, who does not believe in the plenary inspiration of the Bible; and to all parents who would prefer teaching their children from a different book.

It would be unphilosophical, because it assumes that belief is a matter of choice—that a child can choose to believe in the Mosaic history, while at the same time he is taught the facts of geology and astronomy! The very rocks and stones upon which the Earth's history of herself has been written in indelible characters contradict the Biblical record. As the pupil is made acquainted with the science of the heavens, of the firmament above him, how can he choose to believe in the plenary inspiration of the book! His faith in it will be lost forever, unless, indeed, like another Hugh Miller, he loses his reason in the futile attempt to reconcile such a revelation with science.

It would be unscientific, because all science teaches that our world, and all it contains—animate and inanimate—is governed by fixed, uniform laws, not by a supernatural power, above and outside of law, as the Protestant Bible teaches. All experience, as well as science, demonstrates this great fact. Never do we see a supernatural power intervening to prevent the uniformity of Nature's laws. The Chicago fire burned up the houses of the good and the just, quite as much as those of the wicked and sinful. The sacred churches were consumed, as well as the rum-shops and places of infamy.

The Protestant Bible would teach children to expect a supernatural intervention. In case of drought, they would pray for rain; in sickness they would supplicate for health; while science and common sense would teach them to obey the laws of health, and to expect rain in accordance with the usual natural conditions.

As an evidence that men of culture and learning everywhere believe that we are creatures of law, allow me to read a short extract from the Cincinnati Commercial of last week. It states that Dr. Carpenter "recently read a paper on 'The Reign of Law,' before a certain religious institution called Zion College, where the bishops and clergy of London are wont occasionally to meet to listen to a paper or lecture, which is followed by a discussion. Dr. Carpenter in his essay maintained 'that Nature represented a kingdom of orderly evolution, which had never been invaded by anything arbitrary, preternatural, or supernatural; and his address ended by the emphatic declaration that all liturgies, litanies, collects, and prayers that were ever uttered never had influenced—never could influence—the course of this universe, nor mankind, nor a single individual, in the slightest degree.' This paper created the most intense excitement, which was further increased when Professor Tyndall arose and said in a slow and solemn voice: 'I am speaking to men of education and men of learning; to men who have read history and observed the course of Nature; and I feel constrained to ask you, as gentlemen of culture, whether it is really possible that you can have any belief in the efficacy of prayer to affect this universe in the slightest degree.'"

It would therefore be in the highest degree irrational to teach our children a religious faith which would be flatly contradicted by the facts made known to them by science and observation.

If, then, the Protestant Bible is to be read as an infallible text-book of divine revelation, we should vote to exclude it from the schools; but if it is to be classed with other histories of religions, by all means let it be read side by side with the other Bibles of every nation.

We are surprised that gentlemen on the other side are in favor of taking away from any man, or his children, his beloved Bible. If he believes in the Protestant Bible, let him and his children enjoy it to their hearts' content; no matter whether he believes in the Presbyterian, Methodist, Campbellite, or Unitarian interpretation of it. If he believes in the Catholic, or Douay, Bible, let him enjoy it; if in the Jewish Talmud, or in the rationalist's Bible of science, let them and their children enjoy them, and go on their way rejoicing.

But if you attempt to bind down all men to your own dogmatic Bible, you virtually take away their right to enjoy their own Sacred Scriptures; and soon they will burst asunder the bonds of such mental slavery. Judging from the rapid progress of science all over the civilized globe, occupying as it does no longer a defensive attitude, but attacking the very strongholds of superstition in London, we may confidently expect that in 1876 we shall see a more glorious spiritual independence gained than the political independence of 1776.

A SENSIBLE HEATHEN.—It seems that when writers or speakers want to use a particularly noble and charitable sentiment, they look for it among the works of heathen writers. Notwithstanding the innumerable Christian sources from which they are at liberty to draw, it appears that the search for grand, rugged, unselfish charity, generally carries them back to the heathens.

But it was of Mr. Disraeli in particular that Roundabout was thinking. That gentleman is somewhat famous for saying eminently beautiful and large-minded things, and quite recently distinguished himself by a quotation which attracted more than usual notice. Freely rendered, it runs thus:—

> "These things and all things, at all times, I say;
> My faith is come straight from the gods to men.
> Whoso deems other form of doctrine true,
> He has his creed; let me adhere to mine."

It struck everybody as the consummation of perfect liberality—the gracious and divine deliverance of thought which makes men god-like; but, on inquiry, it was found to be an excerpt from the Ajax of Sophocles, and not from any of the great Anglican polemics, as many pious churchmen at first supposed. —New Orleans Times.

GENERAL LAMAR'S EULOGY ON SUMNER IN CONGRESS.

Mr. Speaker: I rise to second the resolutions presented by the member from Massachusetts. I believe that they express a sentiment which pervades the hearts of all the people whose representatives are here assembled. Strange as, in looking back upon the past, the assertion may seem, impossible as it would have been ten years ago to make it, it is not the less true that to-day Mississippi deeply regrets the death of Charles Sumner, and sincerely unites in paying honors to his memory. Not because of the splendor of his intellect, though in him was extinguished one of the brightest of the lights which have illustrated the councils of the government for nearly a quarter of a century; not because of the high culture, the elegant scholarship, and the varied learning which revealed themselves so clearly in all his public efforts as to justify the application to him of Johnson's felicitous expression, "He touched nothing which he did not adorn." Not this, though these are qualities by no means, it is to be feared, so common in public places as to make their disappearance, in even a single instance, a matter of indifference, but because of those peculiar and strongly marked moral traits of his character which gave the coloring to the whole tenor of his singularly dramatic public career; traits which made him for a long period, to a large portion of his countrymen, the object of as deep and passionate a hostility as to another he was one of enthusiastic admiration, and which are not the less the cause that now unites all these parties, ever so widely differing, in a common sorrow, to-day, over his lifeless remains. It is of these high moral qualities that I wish to speak; for these have been the traits which in after years, as I have considered the successive acts and utterances of this remarkable man, fastened most strongly my attention, and impressed themselves most forcibly upon my imagination, my sensibilities, my heart. I leave to others to speak of his intellectual superiority, of those rare gifts with which Nature had so lavishly endowed him, and of the power to use them which he had acquired by education. I say nothing of his vast and varied stores of historical knowledge, or of the wide extent of his reading in the elegant literature of ancient and modern times, or of his wonderful power of retaining what he had read, or of his readiness in drawing upon these fertile resources to illustrate his own arguments. I say nothing of his eloquence as an orator, of his skill as a logician, or of his powers of fascination in the unrestrained freedom of the social circle, which last it was my misfortune not to have experienced. These, indeed, were the qualities which gave him eminence, not only in our country but throughout the world; and which have made the name of Charles Sumner an integral part of our nation's glory. They were the qualities which gave to those moral traits of which I have spoken the power to impress themselves upon the history of the age and of the civilization itself; and without which those traits, however intensely developed, would have exerted no influence beyond the personal circle immediately surrounding their possessor. More eloquent tongues than mine will do them justice. Let me speak of the characteristics which brought the illustrious Senator who has just passed away into direct and bitter antagonism for years with my own State and her sister States of the South.

Charles Sumner was born with an instinctive love of freedom, and was educated from his earliest infancy to the belief that freedom is the natural and indefeasible right of every intelligent being having the outward form of man. In him, in fact, this creed seems to have been something more than a doctrine imbibed from teachers, or a result of education. To him it was a grand intuitive principle inscribed in blazing letters upon the tablet of his inner consciousness, to deny which would have been for him to deny that he himself existed. And along with this all-controlling love of freedom, he possessed a moral sensibility keenly intense and vivid, a conscientiousness which would never permit him to swerve by the breadth of a hair from what he pictured to himself as the path of duty. Thus were combined in him the characteristics which have in all ages given to religion her martyrs, and to patriotism her self-sacrificing heroes.

To a man thoroughly permeated and imbued with such a creed, and animated and constantly actuated by such a spirit of devotion, to behold a human being or a race of human beings restrained of what he deemed their natural rights to liberty, for no crime by him or them committed, was to feel all the belligerent instincts of his nature roused to combat. The fact was to him a wrong which no logic could justify. It mattered not to him how humble in the scale of rational being the subject of this restraint might be, how dark his skin or how dense his ignorance. Behind all that lay for him the great principle that liberty is the birthright of all humanity, and that every individual of every race who has a soul to save is entitled to the freedom which may enable him to work out his salvation. It mattered not to him that the slave might be contented with his lot; that his actual condition might be immeasurably more desirable than that from which it had transplanted him; that it had given him physical comfort, mental elevation, and Christian truth, possessed by his race in no other condition; that his bonds had not been placed upon his hands by the living generation; that the mixed social system, of which he formed an element, had been regarded by the fathers of the republic, and by the ablest statesmen who had risen up after them, as too complicated to be broken up without danger to society itself, or even to civilization; or, finally, that the actual state of things had been recognized and explicitly sanctioned by the very organic law of the republic. Weighty as these considerations might be, formidable as were the difficulties in the way of the practical enforcement of his great principle, he held none the less that it must sooner or later be enforced, though institutions and constitutions should have to give way alike before it. But here let me do this eminent man the justice which, amid the excitements of the struggle between the sections, now past, I may have been disposed to deny him. In this fiery zeal and this earnest warfare against the wrong, as he viewed it, there entered no enduring personal animosity toward the men whose lot it was to be born to the system which he denounced. It has been the kindness of the sympathy which in these later years he has displayed toward the impoverished and suffering people of the Southern States that has unveiled to me the generous and tender heart which beat beneath the bosom of the zealot, and has forced me to yield him the tribute of my respect, I might even say of my admiration. Nor in the manifestation of this has there been anything which a proud and sensitive people, smarting under a sense of recent discomfiture and present suffering, might not frankly accept, or which would give them just cause to suspect its sincerity. For, though he raised his voice, as soon as he believed the momentous issues of this great military conflict were decided, in behalf of amnesty to the vanquished, and though he stood forward ready to welcome back as brothers and to reëstablish in their rights as citizens those whose valor had so nearly riven asunder the Union which he loved, yet he insisted that the most ample protection and the largest safeguards should be thrown around the liberties of the newly enfranchised African race. Though he knew very well that, of his conquered fellow-citizens of the South, by far the larger portion, even those who most heartily acquiesced in and desired the abolition of slavery, seriously questioned the expediency of investing, in a single day and without any preliminary tutelage, so vast a body of inexperienced and uninstructed men with the full powers and responsibilities of citizenship and suffrage, he would tolerate no half-way measures upon a point to him so vital.

Indeed, immediately after the war, while other minds were occupying themselves with different theories of reconstruction, he did not hesitate to impress most emphatically upon the administration, not only in public, but in the confidence of private intercourse, his uncompromising resolution to oppose to the last any and every scheme which should fail to provide the surest guarantees for the personal freedom and political rights of the race which he had undertaken to protect. Whether these measures prove him to be a practical statesman or a theoretical enthusiast is a question on which any judgment which we, to-day, may pronounce must await the revision of posterity. I allude to them here only to show that the spirit of magnanimity which, during the last three years, breathes in his utterances, and manifests itself in all his acts affecting the South, was as evidently honest as it was grateful to the feelings of those to whom it was displayed. It was certainly a gracious act toward the South, though, unhappily, it jarred upon the sensibilities of the people at the other extreme of the Union, to propose to erase from the banners of the national army the mementoes of the bloody internecine struggle, which might be regarded as assailing the pride or wounding the sensibilities of the Southern people. That proposal will never be forgotten by that people so long as the name of Charles Sumner lives in the memory of man. But, while it touched the heart of the South and elicited her profound gratitude, her people would not have asked of the North such an act of self-renunciation.

Conscious that they themselves were animated by devotion to constitutional liberty, and that the brightest pages of history are replete with evidences of the depth and sincerity of that devotion, the Southern people can but cherish the recollections of the battles fought and the victories won in defence of their hapless cause. And respecting, as all true and brave men must respect, the martial spirit with which the men of the North vindicated the integrity of the Union and their devotion to the principles of human freedom, they do not ask, they do not wish, the North to strike the mementoes of her heroism and victory from either records, or monuments, or battle-flags. They would rather that both sections should gather up the glories won by each section, not envious, but proud of each other, and regard them a common heritage of American valor, so that future generations, when they remember the deeds of heroism and devotion done on both sides, will speak not of Northern prowess or Southern courage, but of the heroism, fortitude, and courage of Americans in a war of ideas—a war in which each section signalized its consecration to the principles, as each understood them, of American liberty and of the Constitution received from their fathers.

It was my misfortune, perhaps my fault, personally, never to have known this eminent philanthropist and statesman. The impulse was often strong upon me to go to him, and offer him my hand and my heart with it, and to express to him my thanks for his kind and considerate course, of late years, toward the people with whom I am identified. If I did not yield to that impulse, it was because the thought occurred that other days were coming in which such a demonstration might be more opportune and less liable to misconstruction. Suddenly, and without premonition, a day has come, at last, to which, for such a purpose, there is no to-morrow. My regret is, therefore, intensified by the thought that I failed to speak to him out of the fulness of my heart while there was yet time.

How often is it that death thus brings unavailingly back to our remembrance opportunities unimproved, in which generous overtures, prompted by the heart, remain unoffered, frank avowals which rose to the lips remain unspoken, and the injustice and wrong of bitter resentments remain unrepaired! Charles Sumner, in life, believed that all occasion for strife and distrust and harsh legislation between the North and South had passed away, and that there no longer remained any cause for continued estrangement between these two sections of our common country. Are there not many of us who believe the same thing? Is not that the common sentiment, or, if it is not, ought it not to be, of the great mass of our people, North and South? Bound to each other by a common Constitution, destined to live together under a common government, forming unitedly but a single member of the great family of nations, shall we not now at last endeavor to grow toward each other once more in heart as we are already indissolubly linked to each other in fortunes? Shall we not, whilst doing honors to the memory of this great champion of human liberty, this feeling sympathizer with human sorrow, this earnest pleader for the exercise of human tenderness and charity, lay aside the concealments which serve only to perpetuate misunderstandings and distrust, and frankly confess that on both sides we most earnestly desire to be one; one not merely in political organization; one not merely in identity of institutions; one not merely in community of language and literature and traditions and country; but, more and better than all that, one also in feeling and in heart? Am I mistaken in this?

Do the concealments of which I speak still cover animosities which neither time nor reflection nor the march of events has yet sufficed to subdue? I cannot believe it. Since I have been here I have scrutinized your sentiments as expressed, not merely in public debate, but in the abandon of personal confidence. I know well the sentiments of these my Southern brothers, whose hearts are so infolded together that the feeling of each is the feeling of all; and I see on both sides only the seeming of a constraint which each apparently hesitates to dismiss. The South—prostrate, exhausted, drained of her life-blood as well as of her material resources, yet still honorable and true—accepts the bitter award of the bloody arbitrament without reservation, resolutely determined to abide the result with chivalrous fidelity; yet, as if struck dumb by the magnitude of her reverses, she suffers on in silence!

The North, exultant in her triumph and elated by success, still cherishes, as we are assured, a heart full of magnanimous emotions toward her disarmed and discomfited antagonist; and yet, as if under some mysterious spell, her words and acts are the words and acts of suspicion and distrust. Would that the spirit of the illustrious dead whom we lament to-day could speak from the grave to both parties in this deplorable discord in tones that should reach each and every heart throughout this broad territory: "My countrymen, know one another, and you will love one another."—Boston Globe.

PRISON LIBRARIES.

In one of the recent periods of disturbance on the Gold Coast, a veteran English general insisted that only men who could read and write should be enlisted for service in that unwholesome quarter. "Those fellows keep themselves occupied, and therefore cheerful, and therefore well, and in good morale," he said; "but the ignoramuses simply feed on their own grievances in the long seasons of inaction, get low and discontented, mutiny, desert, or sicken and die with vacancy of mind and homesickness. They can't stand the monotony of the life and the separation from their friends."

We have lately spoken of the enormous disproportion in the list of criminals between the intelligent and the illiterate classes, reckoning simply the ability to read and write as the standard of cultivation. In New England ninety-three per cent. of the inhabitants, above the age of ten, can pass this test. From the remaining fraction come eighty per cent. of the convictions for crime. In New York and Pennsylvania the offenses of ignorance are, to those of enlightenment, as seven to one, and in the country at large as ten to one.

Our prisons, then, are occupied chiefly by tenants whose habit of moral stumbling follows on their blackness of mental darkness. They are convicted rogues, but they have not ceased to be men. What should hinder the hard fate of the expatriated soldier from overtaking them? Wherein their conditions differ it is to the disadvantage of the prisoners. We might reasonably expect to find among them, therefore, a disposition "to feed on their own grievances, to get low and discontented, to mutiny, desert," and, if not "to sicken and die of vacancy of mind and homesickness," then to grow still more callous and insensible to gentle influences.

But our prison system, affirms the State, has not more in view the safety of society than the reformation of the criminal. The very first step toward this end, then, would seem to have been the establishment of a thorough method of elementary education coincident with the incarceration of the first half-dozen unrighteous whom the State felt compelled to shut up for the well-being of the more upright remainder. But New York, for example, has been putting her malefactors behind bolts and bars for two centuries and a half, ever since good Governor Peter Minuit purchased Manhattan Island of the Indians for twenty-five dollars, and was forced to commit to the improvised lock-up various and sundry persons whose patriotic joy over that event effervesced in drunken and disorderly demonstrations. And not yet has she devised any organized system of instruction adapted to the needs of those grown-up children, the convicts, who are to be taught to begin life over again.

The consequence of this neglect is not far to seek. A frightful majority of the discharged prisoners, coming out of jail as unintelligent and as little fitted for pursuits of honest industry as they went in, returns thither again and again, each absence being a period of missionary activity wherein their energy makes new converts to their gospel of depravity. That even jail-birds are capable of better uses experience has proved, not once but many times, and economic as well as humane motives prompt society to subject them to intellectual and industrial training.

The Russian penitentiary at Moscow, for example, re-receives less than one-half of one per cent. of the original commitments. Each inmate, besides obtaining elementary instruction, is required to learn some one trade in the most thorough manner, and this trade is of his own choosing. The earnings of his apprenticeship belong to the State, but of those of his journeymanship he has a liberal share. The hope of this reward of industry and good conduct so inspires the prisoners that not a few of them master their business in two months, and nine-tenths are capable of being foremen on leaving the jail. The Irish prison system, which also makes instruction its corner-stone, is not less successful. It is much more severe, especially in the early months of sentence, than our own. But it permits no capricious punishments, no arbitrary pardons, no possible exhibition of favoritism. It appeals to the convict's ambition and hope, regulates his privileges by his good behavior, studiousness, and industry, and, as the term of his imprisonment wears on, trusts largely to his sense of honor.

But the beginning of advancement in every instance of real reformation has been the awakening of the slow and dormant intelligence of these step-children of Nature. And therefore a late appeal for books and papers for his large family of rogues, made by Warden Hubbell of Sing Sing, ought to be answered by a library not for that prison alone, but for every jail and penitentiary in the land. It has been the general custom of jailers to lock up the felons in the darkness of their solitary cells, as soon as they have eaten the coarse supper which follows their hard day's work. Ignorance is always superstitious. Who shall say what awful spectres people the silence of those chilly dungeons? Who shall estimate the loss of healthful energies through this slow sapping of the nerves, or guess how fast the intellectual aptitude dies out in minds shut in to the lowest pleasures and interests of the coarse and diseased bodies that hold them?

So great is his fear of this nightly vigil with the ghosts of his evil past and wretched present that many a poor prisoner presses out all the grease from his scant rations of meat, and, with a poor wisp of rag, makes a feeble taper which keeps off the darkness for another short half-hour. Sing Sing has changed this cruel usage. Each cell has its lamp. Each well-behaved prisoner is allowed to read till nine o'clock every night, the only condition being that he shall take good care of his book or paper. The prison library now contains six hundred volumes, and five or six thousand old magazines and newspapers, which have been read thread-bare. The taking away of the lamp is the heaviest punishment which can be inflicted. "In the evening," says Warden Hubbell, "nearly every prisoner will be found reading, and those who could not read when they came here are earnestly studying or learning to form letters with pen or pencil. Before we had the lamps and books and papers, the prisoners were noisy and mischievous, continually forming plans for wrong-doing; now all seem to crave the quiet hours for reading and study."

We have no sentimental sympathy with criminals. The man who refuses submission to the iron-handed restraints of society ought to be shut out of society. Imprisonment is as just as it is necessary, and it should be made so hard and unattractive that no man, knowing its stern privations, will be willing to return to it. But its use should be to rouse in prisoners that self-respect which makes them of value to themselves and to society; to create within them an exalted force swaying them towards goodness, which shall be stronger than the low forces that sway them towards evil; to convince them that society stops them in their reckless way for their own good, and stands ready to receive them again when they are ready to accept the moral obligations which liberty imposes.

This ideal end is perfectly practicable. It is only necessary that all reformatory prison discipline should work with Nature, not against it. And we count the felon's awakened intelligence the broad fulcrum on which must rest the lever of wise effort that shall lift this dead weight of ignorant criminality into the upper air.—Christian Union.

CATHOLIC CLERGYMEN AND PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

In last year's City Council there was a good deal of discussion on the subject of religion in the public institutions, which was brought about in this way: Early in the year, a large number of prominent Catholics of the city presented to the Board of Directors of Public Institutions a petition, the prayer of which was to the effect that all persons in city institutions who professed the Catholic faith be allowed the services of clergymen in whom they believe. No appreciable action was taken on this petition, and the replies of the Board to questions asked by the City Council were regarded by the members of the latter as very evasive and unsatisfactory. The subject was reopened, this year, by the presentation to the Board of Directors, at its meeting, last evening, of the following petition:—

To the Honorable the Board of Directors of Public Institutions of the City of Boston:

We, the undersigned, respectfully ask that all inmates of institutions owned or controlled by the City of Boston may be guaranteed freedom of conscience, and that all Roman Catholic inmates who desire it may enjoy the services of a Catholic clergyman. We offer your honorable Board the following reasons:

In the various penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions of the city, a majority of the inmates are Roman Catholics, while the only religious services provided, whether for their reformation or their comfort, are non-Catholic, and attendance thereon is obligatory. As regards those who become wards of the city from no offence, but owing to infirmity, adversity, accident, or other ill-fortune, the denial of the practise of their religion, the chief enjoyment and solace left them in this life, is a grievance too apparent to call for any argument. In the case of Catholics, on the other hand, subjected to loss of liberty and correctional discipline for offences against society and the laws, the need is evident of whatever religious influence is for them most powerful. They are convicts, if young, almost invariably from ignorance of their religion; if mature, certainly from neglect of its teachings; and humanity and wisdom alike should seek their reform by those elevating and restraining influences best adapted to them, which hitherto they have not known, or have neglected. It is a well-known fact that, under our present system of correction, criminals are not generally or in a great degree reformed, but usually are returned again and again by the courts for punishment. It is equally well known that for Catholics no other moral or religious appeals, of any nature whatsoever, compare in force and effect with those of their own church.

Our excellent Chief Magistrate, while indeed surveying our whole Commonwealth in his late address to the Legislature, says much regarding penitentiary reform which touches her chief city. Governor Washburn says crime increases in a ratio far more rapid than population; that prisoners should be better classified and separated, and their treatment made not only punitive but reformatory and encouraging as well; and he adds: "We need to impress upon the criminal that, while society restrains and punishes him, it stands ready to welcome him to liberty when he proves himself worthy of trust. We need continually to make him feel sure that although he has fallen there is opportunity for him to rise again, and that his whole future depends upon himself." These measured and earnest words are worth pondering. As regards Catholic offenders, we are sure that the most effective means for recalling them to virtue will be found in the practise of their religion, and, convicts though they be, we avow our interest in them, and our earnest desire to befriend and reclaim them. In respectfully urging upon your honorable Board this our petition, we would say no mere experiment is suggested. In English houses of punishment and reformation, Catholic as well as Protestant chaplains are provided. In Canada, an admirable method of religious influence is adopted, happy alike in its conception and its results, for particulars of which we beg to refer to a letter herewith received from the superintendent. And in the instructive official report to the United States Government of the Rev. E. E. Wines, D.D., LL.D., of New York, we learn of other Christian communities where the practicableness and utility of varied religious influence for criminals has been equitably and wisely settled.

The Rev. Dr. Wines officially informs the American Government: "In the Austrian prisons of all kinds, chaplains and religious teachers are provided for prisoners of every sect." "In France, liberty of conscience is guaranteed to prisoners of all religions." "In Prussia, chaplains are found in all the prisons and for all forms of worship." "In Saxony, the religious wants of prisoners are equally regarded and cared for, whatever their creed may be." "The Belgian Government attaches the highest importance to religious instruction as a means of reformation, and has given to it the most complete organization possible. Chaplains are provided in all prisons and for all religions." "In the Netherlands, the office of chaplain and the religious services are confided to one of the parish ministers of each religion." "In Russia, prisoners of all the different creeds receive the offices of religion from ministers of their own creed,—even Jews and Mussulmans." "In Switzerland, ministers of the Reformed and of the Catholic religion act as chaplains in the prisons. The rabbi of the nearest locality is invited to visit his co-religionists."

If our proud city shall not lead others in liberality and intelligence, she must desire to follow examples whose excellence has been tested and approved, and we look with confidence to your honorable Board for a frank and just compliance with our wishes, in presenting which we represent many thousand citizens, whose names may readily be added to our own.

Among the names attached to the petition were the following: Joseph Iasigi, Theodore Metcalf, P. A. Collins, H. L. Richards, R. H. Salter, M.D., John G. Blake, M.D., William S. Pelletier, John Boyle O'Reilly, P. R. Guiney, Samuel Tuckerman, George F. Emery, Hugh O'Brien, Charles F. Donnelly, John C. Crowley, Robert Morris, John B. Moran, M.D., R. D. THE RELIGIOUS PAPERS are discussing the proper length of sermons. In the happy times, three hundred years ago, sermons were ten, twenty or thirty minutes long—never longer. Then the hour-glass came in to measure them, and the preacher preached the sand out. Many pulpits were furnished with iron stands for the reception of the hour-glass. One such is still existing at Compton Bassett Church, Wilts, with a fleur de lis handle for turning the glass when the sand had run out. Another, at Hurst, in Berkshire, has a fanciful wrought iron frame, with foliage of oak and ivy, and an inscription, "As this glass runneth, so man's life passeth." At Cliffe, in Kent, is a stand for an hour-glass on a bracket affixed to the pulpit. The parish accounts of St. Catherine, Aldgate, contain an old entry, "Paid for an hour-glass that hangeth by the pulpit where the preacher doth make a sermon, that he may know how the hour passeth away, one shilling;" and another relates to a bequest of an "hower glass, with a frame to stand in." One preacher had exhausted his sand-glass, turned it, and gone three-fourths of another running; the congregation had nearly all retired, and the clerk, tired out, audibly asked his reverend superior to lock up the church, and put the key under the door when he was done, as he (the clerk) and the few remaining auditors were going away. Hugh Peters, after preaching an hour, turned his hour-glass and said, "I know you are good fellows, so let's have another glass." Daniel Burgell, an eloquent Non-comformist divine in the early part of the last century, let his hour-glass run out while vehemently preaching against the sin of drunkenness. He reversed it, and exclaimed, "Brethren, I have somewhat more to say on the nature and consequences of drunkenness; so let's have another glass, and then—" which is a regular toper's phrase. A rector of Bilbury used to preach two hours, with two turns of the glass; after the giving out of the text the 'squire of the parish withdrew, smoked his pipe, and returned to the blessing. The Golden Age thinks that a sermon should be as long as the Moral Law; any less is too little, any more is too much.—Golden Age.

Poetry.

DEDICATORY POEM,

READ AT THE OPENING OF COSMIAN HALL, FLORENCE, MARCH 25.

BY GEORGE S. BURLEIGH.

Before the primal dawn began
To whiten on the shores of night,
Jehovah's living fiat ran,
"Let there be light!" and there was light.

High souls have caught that word sublime,
And hurled it on from age to age,
Where sullen darkness, woe, and crime
Still crouched with muttered hate and rage.

In vain the cloven deeps of gloom
Rolled back to bury and destroy;
Dark worlds leapt flashing into bloom,
And light was life and life was joy!

Sons of the all-creative Light,
Disciples of the unfolding Good,
Glad warriors of the Eternal Fight
Whose victories are unstained with blood,

To Him who is the Light and Life—
More served by gladness than by fear—
This bulwark in the joyous strife,
This Temple of the Heart we rear!

Wisdom and Love, with married palms,
Shall walk this consecrated Hall,
And armèd Truth's exulting psalms
Respond to Freedom's clarion call!

To sinless mirth, and solemn thought,
To every pulse of struggling good,
To God through human clay unwrought—
Our manhood and our womanhood—

To life, and death, and all between
That comes to make us pure and great,
With reverent soul and gladsome mien
This Temple-Home we dedicate!

GLIMPSES.

HAS MAN any worse enemy than his own ignorance?

THE "CONGRESSIONAL PETITION" foots up 5,481 names in all; the "Massachusetts Petition" foots up 8,949.

THE IMPOSSIBILITY of keeping up our private correspondence will not, we trust, be construed as wilful neglect or careless indifference. Piles of important letters must still go unanswered, by reason of their number alone, and no one can regret the fact so much as we do.

A PRIVATE RECEPTION in honor of Mr. Sumner's memory was given by Mrs. Sargent on April 30, at which a fine paper was read by Mr. Weiss, and appropriate remarks were made by Dr. Bartol, the poet Whittier, Senator Schurz, Mr. Potter, Mr. C. P. Cranch, and others.

A PUBLIC MEETING in favor of the Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution was held in the Thirty-ninth Street Presbyterian Church, New York, on the evening of April 14. That despised movement manifests a vitality inexplicable to most people. The last has by no means been heard of it yet.

SIGNATURES to the "Massachusetts Petition" for church-taxation have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: From E. F. Strickland, Chelsea, 44; from Eunice M. Wallis, Boston, 10; from Mrs. E. F. Newhall, Boston, 19; from Francis Fletcher, Clinton, 16; from Rev. William R. Alger, Boston, 15. Total—104.

SIGNATURES to the "Congressional Petition" for church-taxation have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: From George M. Wood, Secretary of the Washington, D.C., Liberal League, 56; from Allen Keen, Duplain, Mich., 50; from Eunice M. Wallis, Boston, 11; from Francis Fletcher, Clinton, Mass., 18; from Mrs. E. F. Newhall, Boston, 19; from H. W. Moore, Peabody, Mass., 30; from Marcus T. Janes, Providence, R.I., 32; from John Monroe, Waterford, Me., 38. Total—236.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE of Vineland, N. J., collected not long since about one hundred names to a petition for the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools in that place. It was presented by a committee of three to the Trustees of School District, No. 44, with remarks in support of it. At the same time, however, a counter-petition with nearly one thousand signatures was also presented; and the remonstrants carried the day. Such occurrences as these have an important lesson for those who believe that the power of Orthodoxy is all undermined by the growth of liberalism.

WE HOPE that no one of our readers will fail to read with close attention the opening paper of this issue on "Compulsory Education." It is full of instruction on a subject of the utmost practical consequence, and deserves to be scattered broadcast over the land. No country that adopts the principle of universal suffrage can afford to reject the principle of strictly universal education; for the two must stand or fall together. The facts and figures here presented ought to be studied by every lover of free institutions, and especially by every lover of freedom in religion. Where universal ignorance prevails, superstition has its impregnable stronghold; where universal intelligence is diffused, superstition finds a soil in which it cannot grow. Speed the day when it will be impossible to discover a single illiterate person throughout the length and breadth of our country!

GENERAL CHAMBERLAIN, Warden of the Massachusetts State Prison, has honorably fulfilled his promise, made to the Second Radical Club, to exonerate Mr. Burns from the injurious charge of assisting in the escape of two prisoners from that institution, as the following card shows:—

"AMENDE HONORABLE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLOBE:

Sir,—I am convinced that Assistant Watchman Moore of this prison was mistaken as to the time when he states that he believes that he saw one James Burns making signals and shouting to prisoners on the 19th of February last. Also, though at the time circumstances pointed strongly towards James Burns as being accessory to the escape of Worthing and Jones, I am now satisfied that he had no knowledge of their intentions.

S. E. CHAMBERLAIN, Warden.

Massachusetts State Prison, Warden's Office, Charlestown, April 28, 1874.

A LITTLE TWO-PAGE sheet called the Freethinker has just appeared in Eau Claire, Wisconsin, to be "published semi-occasionally" and edited by "Will" Kennedy, Secretary of the Liberal League in that place. It makes no charge for subscription at all, and seems to be a "free Will" offering to the liberal cause. The "Demands of Liberalism" and the form of local organization are published in full, together with a modest little "Salutatory," an article by Mr. B. F. Underwood entitled "George Washington an 'Infidel,'" and various paragraphs by the editor, of which the following is one: "An educated clergyman of this city says he doubts the truth of the assertion that rocks grow. But then he believes the far more improbable story that they were created out of nothing! Ah, the wondrous power of faith!" We hope the little paper will live to do good service in the agitation for more thorough separation of Church and State.

THE GREAT eulogy on Charles Sumner by Carl Schurz was given in Music Hall, Boston, on April 29, to an audience of not less than thirty-five hundred people. It was worthy of the occasion and of the man; which being said, no more remains to be said. Especially interesting was the narrative of the last three years of the great Senator's life, embracing the period of his painful disagreement with his own party in the presidential campaign of 1872. It was a magnificent vindication of his motives and spirit, made all the more impressive by the fact that Mr. Schurz stood shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Sumner during the whole struggle. At the time, notwithstanding our great veneration for Charles Sumner, we could not follow his lead, and under the circumstances should undoubtedly vote again as we then voted; but we rejoice to remember now that our confidence in him as a man never wavered for an instant, and that we shared to the full the indignation of his followers when Thomas Nast, the Preston S. Brooks of 1872, made his pencil the bludgeon of a foul and villainous assault upon the "whitest soul" that ever shone in the Senate of the United States. The explanation given by Mr. Schurz of the famous battle-flag resolution threw new light, at least to our own mind, upon the real object of that measure; and we confess that he changed our opinion concerning it. In THE INDEX of September 18, 1873, as also before, we expressed an earnest hope that Massachusetts would repeal her wretched censure resolution before it was too late; and this we did while still disapproving the course proposed by Mr. Sumner with reference to the flags. But now we acknowledge our own misjudgment of that course. Sumner was not only pure in his motive, but right in his proposal; and the national army flags ought indeed to bear no record of civil conflict to gall the proud spirit of the Southern soldiers who may yet be called to defend them with their blood. Let the State flags, torn and stained, still bear the names of the victories over which they floated, and be sacredly cherished; but let the national flags be symbols of a people reunited in heart as well as in government.

"NATURAL" AND "CHRISTIAN" MORALITY.

The Churchman (published, we believe, in New York City by the Episcopalians) was recently quoted as follows in one of the leading Boston dailies, with reference to the Eighth Demand of Liberalism:—

"Nothing will satisfy this but the enactment of universal license. For Christian morality must be taken out of natural morality. That is just what the 'Demand' number eight amounts to, and not only Christian morality but Jewish morality as well, since the two are inseparably combined. Heathen morality—in other words, *im*morality, that which has no affinity to or share in the Christian code—is the only basis of the new law. Now this has been once tried and partly carried out, and the French Revolution gave the experiment a fair chance. That was THE INDEX platform put in practice. And there is something as absurd as it is pitiable for a sheet which flaunts such a profession in the public face to be calling for more liberty. Toleration goes to its utmost permissible verge when it permits the existence of THE INDEX."

Who or what is it that presumes to "tolerate" THE INDEX? The State or the Church? If this insolent critic replies, "The State," we would tell it that the State no more "tolerates" THE INDEX than it does the Churchman, but recognizes the equal right of both papers to speak their own convictions without censorship or supervision. If it replies, "The Church," we tell it that the Church is powerless either to "tolerate" or not to "tolerate" THE INDEX, over which (thanks to the so-called infidels who founded this government on the right of free thought and free speech) it has no more authority or control that it has over the internal affairs of Egypt or Siam. Doubtless, if the Churchman, or the Church itself, had the least power to exercise jurisdiction over the public press, THE INDEX would have been torn to pieces long ago. But until it re-acquires such power, we remind the Churchman that the savage growl of the tiger behind the bars of his cage strikes no terror into the spectator's heart, and simply advertises the fact of his own deserved captivity. Let the Churchman gnaw its bone in peace, and thank its stars that the possibility of caging it has preserved it hitherto from the huntsman's bullet. It is a very respectable tiger in point of temper and claws; but the safety and equal freedom of all "permit its existence" only in the menagerie.

But what opacity of perception is betrayed in the above comments on Christian and natural morality! Morality is a science, or it is nothing. It is grounded on natural laws cognizable by human reason, or else it is the arbitrary enactment of a usurping institution. In a recent lecture on "Scientific Ethics," we have shown what we meant by "natural morality" in the Demands of Liberalism. Whether it is synonymous with "universal license," the intelligent may decide for themselves. The Churchman jumps to the conclusion that everything taught by Christian morality must be stricken out of natural morality; whereas we showed that the Golden Rule is an unscientific but substantially correct statement of what, scientifically stated, is the doctrine of primary rights and duties. All that is true in Christian morals is recognized and re-asserted in scientific ethics; but, while the latter winnows out the wheat from the chaff of Christian morals and preserves it all, it also garners a vast harvest raised in fields which Christianity never tilled. It is immeasurably more than a mere eclectic, patching up a new system from fragments of old ones,—it is the philosophical reduction of isolated precepts, which is all that the historic religions have to give, to universal principles which not only set these precepts in wholly new lights, but are fruitful of new ones of great importance.

For instance, what basis in Christian morals is there for the principle that society has no right to interfere with the liberty of any individual, except to preserve the maximum degree of liberty for all individuals? This principle lies at the foundation of all truly republican institutions; yet Christianity has never got beyond the Golden Rule, which simply prescribes (with the very uncertain test of subjective desire) the relative rights of individuals to each other. "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you"—that is, as you would like that others should do unto you. Has Christian morality any broader precept than that, imperfect as it is, and capable of great abuse as is the standard it sets up? Surely the grand conception of equal rights, independent of all likes or dislikes, is an immense advance upon it! And when this conception of equal rights as between individuals leads to the still larger conception of each individual's right to be free from all control by society, except so far as the equal rights of all other individuals require such control, does not the vast superiority of scientific ethics to Christian ethics become patent to all? We affirm unqualifiedly that the Christian gospel has no teachings whence the idea of republicanism, of universal liberty, of the indefeasible rights of all mankind, can be legitimately derived. These are fundamental ideas of modern morality; and it is neither more nor less than preposterous to refer their origin to a state of society in which they did not exist. The obscurest Abolitionist occupied higher moral ground than the founder of the Christian religion, to whom slavery did not, so far as the records show, appear an evil at all. Sentimental or traditional or sectarian prejudice may ignore such thoughts as these for a long time to come; but they are certain to be valued at their true worth at last.

It is not necessary to go beyond the conception of "positive morality" itself, declared in all ages by the Church to be the foundation of all its moral teaching, to see how immeasurably inferior its teaching is to the teaching of scientific ethics. "Positive morality" is the ethical law proclaimed by some mediator between God and man, directly authorized by God to do so on the ultimate sanction of the Divine Will alone. The Jews held Moses to be such an authoritative lawgiver; and the Christians have universally held Jesus, the "Christ," to be another. Hence the moral precepts announced by Moses and Jesus have passed as the direct utterances of God, laying down ("positive" comes from ponere) the law to all mankind without appeal. Although individual theologians have seen clearly the danger of referring moral law, as such, to the Divine Will as its ultimate ground, yet the collective voice of the Church, as well as the private soul of the believer, has always taken the "revealed Will of God" as the supreme law of man; and, in Christian eyes, to appeal from this "revealed Will of God" to human reason has always appeared as the rankest impiety. "Thy Will be done!" is the profoundest utterance of Christian faith; and the conception of "positive morality" rests on it exclusively.

But scientific ethics know nothing of "will," human or divine; they constitute a science, as independent as mathematics, and, like mathematics, conversant with necessary relations only. Will did not create moral obligation; will does not impose it. It exists by the necessity of things, so soon as intelligent beings come into mutual relations. Scientific ethics, therefore, rest on the necessary nature of things, and not on any will, revealed or unrevealed. This is not to teach atheism, directly or indirectly; but it does show how the atheist may be as highly and purely moral as the theist—which is a fact. The theist (if of the scientific order) holds that God is absolutely holy because his will is absolutely conformed to the nature of things, and not because his will creates it; that the conditions of being are absolute, depending on no will whatever; and that morality is the science which deals with the absolute conditions under which all moral beings as such, including God himself, exist. From such a conception as this, it is impossible to deduce any "positive morality" in the Christian sense of the words; and it is a conception wholly foreign to Christian thought, as expressed in the great creeds and formulas of the Church. But it is the only conception by which moral teachings can be made amenable to human reason,—the only conception, therefore, which rationalism can accept as the true groundwork of human society. And it is this fundamental conception which is the justification of the eighth Demand of Liberalism.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 28th and 29th of May. The meeting will open with a session for business and addresses on Thursday evening, the 28th, at 7 3-4 o'clock, in Horticultural Hall (lower). At this session the following Amendments to the Constitution are to be acted upon:—

1. In the statement of the objects of the Association in the First Article, to change the phraseology so as to read thus: "Its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history."

2. To change the number of Directors, now limited by the Second Article to "six," so that the number shall be "not less than six nor more than ten."

On Friday, the 29th, there will be sessions for essays and addresses, forenoon and afternoon, in the upper Horticultural Hall, and a Social Festival in the evening at the new Parker Memorial Hall.

Interesting topics are to be discussed by able speakers,—of which further particulars will be given hereafter. WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

We radicals are so liable to undervalue the practical work done by the organized Church, and so apt especially to set down the costly New York churches as mere places of fashionable display, that we need to ponder the lesson conveyed by such statements as the following, in regard to the actual work done by a single one of these organizations. Making all allowance for the fact, often mentioned in THE INDEX, that the Church naturally controls the money-bags of the eminent sinners, while the sinners make more money by being thus associated with the Church,—yet, after all, there is no denying the immense amount of work that can be got out of men by organizing the religious sentiment. The Church rarely leads in any new reform, but it is undoubtedly a magnificent engine for systematizing and enforcing the common charities. It is like a savings bank, which does not originate great business enterprises, but admirably combines and utilizes the common savings. The following is the record, the church in question being that of Rev. S. H. Tyng, Jr., and his methods and successes being in great part imitated from those of his father, Rev. Stephen Higginson Tyng, D.D., also of New York city, whose statistics of achievement are quite as remarkable. T. W. H.

"Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., occupied his new Church of the Holy Trinity, on Madison Avenue, last Sunday. Its cost has been something over $200,000, and the edifice ranks with the finest in the city. During the ten years' rectorship of Mr. Tyng, his society has been notably prolific of good works, having contributed for parish and benevolent purposes over $650,000. Even with the heavy expense of church building, $30,000 have been distributed in charities, the past year. The communicants of the church number 1,300, and the Sunday-school has on its roll the names of 1,563 children. The ways in which the church conducts its charities are numerous. It has a medical dispensary, employing a dozen physicians, which has succored 6,000 sick people; it conducts a kindergarten, several "homes" of one kind or another, an orphanage, five mission chapels, six Sunday-schools, and various industrial schools, besides running a reformatory farm near Sing-Sing. Altogether, the Church of the Holy Trinity is one of the most successful and thoroughly organized dispensers of benevolence of any in the country."—Springfield Republican.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I have lately been preaching on the so-called "Resurrection of Jesus Christ," maintaining that, even if the reappearances of Jesus after his crucifixion be true, the proof of his actual death on the cross is yet wanting. In fact, the more circumstantial and authenticated the reappearances (as recorded in the gospels) the less ground there is for belief in the resurrection.

In the course of my argument, I could not help noticing the great wrong done to man by Jesus not showing himself to Pilate, and to Caiaphas, and to all the people, if he really rose from the dead. On the hypothesis of his mere recovery from a swoon or trance, it was the most natural thing to do to get away in secret, and disguised, and only to appear after nightfall, or in solitary places, and among his chosen friends. It was also prudent and right not to risk a second encounter with the authorities. But if he were God as well as man, and really rose from the dead, it was an act of cruelty not to enlighten the people who had ignorantly put him to death; an act of cruelty to withhold testimony on such a vital question, when it could have been so easily, so triumphantly, given.

This argument has excited the wrath of one of my correspondents, who leaves me in doubt whether he is an Atheist or a Swedenborgian; from his last letter, I almost conclude that he is the latter.

The questions put by him to me in refutation of my arguments have probably occurred already to many minds; and I thought I could kill two birds with one stone if I sent a reply to him through THE INDEX, amongst the readers of which some might be interested in the controversy.

His first question is: "If a Christ raised from the dead ought to have so paraded himself as to have settled the minds of all men as to the fact of resurrection from the dead, then I ask you what ought the God YOU profess to do in the same matter?"

I understand this to imply that God is as much to blame as Christ was in withholding proof of a resurrection, if there be one to prove.

To this I reply, that, if the Christian theory be true, the Supreme God, being a party to the transaction, would be quite as much to blame as Christ. In fact, this is one of the strong arguments against Christianity; namely, that it involves conceptions of God's conduct and character which are immoral.

But the God in whom I believe did not come before the world with the pretensions of Christ (whether made by or for him does not affect the argument). God never appeared on earth revealing Himself to man, or enlightening man as to his duty or destiny. Never has He made any pretence or given any pledge of such revelation; and though man is hungering and thirsting for truth about the unseen world, it does not involve any—the least—derogation from the goodness of God that he refuses to lift the veil which hides these mysteries from human sight. If He thinks it best for man that he should find out these truths for himself—by ever so long and tedious a process,—surely there is no immorality in refusing to work miracles to enlighten us. But Christ is supposed to have come into the world with the express object of revealing God and unfolding our destiny. The Christians boast that he "brought life and immortality to light." If that was so, his refusal to do his work thoroughly was immoral; and his leaving the world still in the dark was an act of injustice and cruelty.

We are far from affirming that God can prove to us His own existence or our immortality, in the present state of our faculties; any more than he could make us, as we are, to live in the sun. It is much more consistent with reason to suppose that we could not be made to understand the nature of God, or spirit, or the hoped-for future life. So we have no reproaches to hurl at our Maker for our ignorance and darkness, provided only that our aspirations be at length gratified.

My correspondent goes on to say: "Dare you go to God and ask why He suffers this bugbear Christianity to predominate in the world? Ask Him why He does not that which you plainly intimate the Christian Christ could and should have done nineteen hundred years back? . . . . You speak of 'poor souls struggling to find God.' Why (I repeat) does He suffer them so painfully to struggle?"

To all this I can only say it is in the highest degree consistent with true goodness and with Divine Love to allow pain and suffering of mind and body, if they are to result in benefits otherwise unattainable.

Many of us are already aware by experience that some pains and sufferings improve the character and ennoble the sufferers; and we are willing to give our God credit for good intentions and for knowing what He is about.

We should cease to be men, but should become quite different beings, if all the errors and falsehoods of the world were to be swept out of our faith, for us, instead of by our own earnest and honest toil and investigation.

We do not need any Christ to come here and pretend to tell us all about God and heaven and immortality, and then, just as we think we are going to have the problems solved, to have the curtain fall and the lights put out. This is mere trifling with most sacred things,—trifling absolutely immoral, and therefore not even to be believed of Jesus, our fellow-man, who, whatever he was, was no juggler, nor hypocrite, nor dissembler.

That he did not do what, under the falsely-conceived Christian theory, he might have been expected to do, as a kind and truthful being, proves that theory to be false. And as we refuse to believe that God would be a party to any such ignoble transaction, so we hold that He is by no means morally bound to interfere in any way with man's own development, with man's detection of his own errors, or with man's acquisition of higher truth.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, April 15, 1874.

WE HAVE heard of the Christian Sabbath, and the Jewish Sabbath, and the Sabbath of the Seventh Day Baptists, and various other kinds of Sabbaths, and now we have what seems to be a bran new one, brought to our attention by an evening co-temporary, called the American Sabbath. Precisely what are the features, characteristics, or requirements, of this new institution, we are not informed with any definiteness, but we infer it to be a device by which the opinions, consciences, habits, and customs, of all classes of people and all nationalities, are to be squared and regulated by those of one nationality. If American means anything in this connection, it must mean that. We trust the time is not far distant, when they will all be superseded by a Lord's Sabbath, which will include the whole week, and wherein it will be understood that there are no degrees in the perfection of his work, and that one day is consequently just as good as another, and that it is just as necessary to do good, and be good, and do no wrong, on the whole seven days, as on only one of them.—Milwaukee Daily News.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN BRAZIL.

To the Editor of The Index:—

It is satisfactory to see that in the Empire of Brazil the civil authority has been vindicated by the trial and imprisonment of the Bishop of Pernambuco, who, by virtue of being a prince of the Church and a most rabid ultramontane, is an upholder of the idea that the Church which he represents is above the law.

This idea is a mistake, as he has found to his cost; and his Church appears, in the South American Empire, like a cobra with its fangs out, to have all the wish to do harm without the ability.

The Constitution of Brazil proclaims the Catholic religion as that of the State, and the bishops of that Church receive a large salary, with titles, privileges, and rank second only to royalty. They have, however, before entering into the enjoyment of all these, to swear to obey the Constitution and the laws of the empire. This oath the Bishop of Pernambuco took, and in his zeal and attachment to the Pope, who, although said to be a Mason, so cordially hates the order as to put it under the ban of the Church, he addressed an order to the Brotherhood of the Most Holy Sacrament, of Pernambuco, commanding them to dismiss from the pale of the Church and their association those who were known to be Masons. This the Brotherhood declined to do, asserting that they had no superior but the government of the Empire of Brazil. The bishop, indignant at being snubbed in this summary manner, fulminated a solemn interdict, or small bull, of his own, anathematizing, as only such as his priestly crew know how to do, all those who disobeyed him, and cutting them off from the various sacraments and other comforts which his Church is supposed to afford her members. This, unfortunately for him, was done without the Imperial placet, and was consequently illegal. The law of the Imperial placet is a constitutional enactment, holding bulls and all the thundering of the Pope as null and void without the previous consent of the Brazilian government; and in consequence the people of Brazil can only be damned by the will of the Pope, if it so pleases (si placet) the Emperor.

The consequence of this illegal proceeding was that the bishop was arrested, tried, convicted, and condemned to four years' imprisonment, with hard labor. This is a healthy sign in South America, and shows the progress of the Brazilian people's mind, and their determination to sustain and defend the liberal provision of their Constitution and laws.

To us, who wish to see liberty everywhere, this contest and its result is most satisfactory.

Yours truly, R. A. Skues.

St. Louis, April 10, 1874.

"THE GROUND OF THEISM: A DIALOGUE."

Dear Mr. Abbot:

I have been thinking over the dialogue on "The Ground of Theism" for some time. The points are strongly put; but I am not satisfied. I must confess that, if I relied entirely on the results of science, I should be an atheist. You affirm that space and time are infinite; I do not see that they are,—that they are even objective. They may be merely conditions of thought; I ask you to prove that they are objective.

You say that "the intellect needs no pictures." I ask for proof of this assertion. It seems to me that the intellect does need pictures; that all thought is a picturing. In order to put any meaning into the word "space," I must picture something. Grey says that "we think in words." As far as I can understand every process of reasoning through which I go, it is a process of making pictures and comparing one with another. I may be wrong; but an honest and thorough effort to understand the working of my own mind brings me to this conclusion. Of course you would not have me believe differently, simply because others say so. Must I not find proof in my own mind, and, if I look within and find that all my thought is in limits and relations, and that a "negation of limit" (which is your definition of "infinity") is a blank, what then? Can I go farther? I can only do so by faith; I can only believe that space and time are objective—that the "intellect needs no pictures"—by faith; that is, by an act of will.

Herbert Spencer says that the test of ultimate truth, where no evidence is needed, is the impossibility of conceiving the opposite. But is it impossible to conceive that space and time are finite and subjective? that the universe, and being, and cause, are finite? If you affirm the contrary, you do not affirm self-evident truths. We therefore ask for evidence. You say the "intellect needs no pictures;" I ask for evidence. I affirm that all thought is a picturing, and appeal to universal consciousness to decide.

I am ready to abide by science. But faith is an "open question," as well as God. Suppose that science legitimates an act of faith? Of course, then, you will admit "faith." I believe that this will be done; that faith, or an act of will, will be vindicated as the only way to reach God. The impulse of science is to go beyond itself, as the bow sends the arrow into the clouds. The bow guides the arrow; so does science guide faith; but the bow remains on earth, as does science.

Admitting that science can prove being (which is denied by some—by Comte, as I understand him),—I do not see how it can prove Infinite Being. There is an awful chasm between the finite and the Infinite that no sweep of thought can cross. Everett hints that thought and will are the two poles of our being. Is not thought the pole that concerns itself with the finite, and will that which leaps into the Infinite?

By acts of will I do not mean simply conscious acts; I think the will acts beneath the consciousness, and that many of our intuitive beliefs, so-called, are acts of will that take place beneath the consciousness. Perhaps this is the case with your belief in the infinitude of time and space. You unconsciously will it.

Excuse my presumption. I am only trying after the truth. My thought is not clear and decisive. Much of what I say is guess-work. Is not that the way all round? Do Hamilton and Hegel do anything more than guess?

I believe in faith only so far as it is warranted by science. Are we radically at swords' points?

Ever yours, S. P. Putnam.

Omaha, Neb.

[We find it impossible to be "at swords' points" with any one who is so transparently seeking to discover truth. But to consider the metaphysical problems above propounded is impracticable in these pages, which are not the place for such a treatment of them as could alone prove satisfactory. So far as the objectivity of space and time are concerned, we can only refer to a long article on "The Philosophy of Space and Time" in the North American Review for July, 1864. Further, to prove that the image-forming faculty (imagination) is distinct from the faculty which apprehends relations as such (intellect or reason) would require a treatise on psychology, not a brief note. Hence we must be content to leave the subject as it now stands.—Ed.]

FAITH NEVER THE PRODUCT OF THE WILL.

Editor of The Index:—

The dialogue on "The Ground of Theism," in The Index of January 15, called vividly to my mind a struggle of my own a few years ago. I had lost my faith in the God of Orthodoxy.

In the interval between the loss of my old faith and the incoming light of a new faith, during which time I read books on positivism, spiritualism, and materialism, I discovered that I could not will myself to believe anything. All attempts were useless. It was like beating the air. This discovery was of great value to me, teaching me a very different method of procedure from any I had followed before. For when I learned that belief was not a matter of volition, but an effect of evidence, perception (internal and external), and knowledge, which no effort of the will could destroy, then did I appreciate as never before the tyranny of that ignorant dogmatism which declares that "doubt is sin, and disbelief is damnation."

Some of my good Orthodox friends declared that I was "in the briers of unbelief." It seemed to me that I was indeed out of the briers, to feel free to take that faith (or none) which should come to me naturally. It was indeed to escape from a night of black darkness to feel no lashing of conscience, or misery arising from an ignorant fear lest it might be wrong to be in honest doubt,—wrong, wicked, depraved, to stay in that doubt until some intelligent help came to my relief. My friends repeated the hymn commencing—but they could see no danger in blind belief. Danger or no danger, however, I could not "go it blind;" my will-power being of no service to me in this emergency.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err;"

But in losing faith in the God of Jewish history,—a God of "fierce wrath and indignation,"—a God who was "angry with the wicked every day,"—who once saw that "everything he had made was very good," and soon after "repented him that he had made man on the earth,"—a God who had possibly "predestined me to eternal damnation for his own honor and glory,"—in losing my faith in this God, I had by no means ceased to believe in an infinite, all-pervading Power, giving life to all that lives.

If I turned to the flowers in my garden, the question would come almost audibly, "Whence this infinite beauty and perfection, and the wonderful geometrical precision in the repetition of numbers in their formation?"

No wonder that Plato said, "God geometrizes"! The question was not satisfactorily answered to me, when I was told that there was a law of order,—that Nature did all this. I could as soon doubt the heart-throbs of love for the little child in my arms as doubt an infinite source of love; as soon doubt the existence of the flowers before me as to assign their life to some law of Nature, and in the same breath deny an Infinite Power animating all Nature.

In the attraction which I felt towards some Infinite Power, I decided that it was not a faith of feeling alone; for when I submitted this faith to the test of reason, I found no protest of the intellect strong enough to unsettle me. My ignorance may have been my bliss, but there was no fear that further knowledge would destroy my faith.

It was with the greatest pleasure that I read, in the "dialogue" referred to, the expression, "I believe in God because my intellect is satisfied of his existence,—because science (which is simply the application of intellect to Nature) has built up, at least in my own mind, a new faith which follows thought, and does not go before it."

While no two individuals ever had precisely the same faith, the above quotation conveys to my mind perfectly the method which will build up my faith; and while with every cycle of progress the expression of that faith may change, yet the idea will remain.

What a refutation of that hard, hard saying, "He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow"!

Most cordially, then, do I accept that principle of Free Religion which affirms "the supremacy of science in matters of belief;" for, knowing that science is not limited to the physical (or material), but comprehends the spiritual as well, I can say with Job, "I know that my vindicator liveth," the vindicator of my faith; and science will yet demonstrate that the internal promptings are the operations of a law of the Infinite, a ceaseless method of the divine economy for human elevation.

Only a word more. A modern seer has defined "essential faith" as "the revelation and reconciliation of spirit to itself; an objective manifestation of what is subjective and natural to the spirit of man." Only that faith, then, which is natural to the spirit of man can lead him to "spiritual oneness with the Infinite One."

My faith, then, leads me inevitably to the belief that the following, a beautiful translation of a Russian piece, of the seventeenth century, gives us a real inspiration:—

"Thou Spirit of my spirit, and my God!
Thy light, Thy love, in their bright plenitude,
Filled me with an immortal soul, to spring
Over the abyss of death; and bade it wear
The garments of eternal day, and wing
Its heavenly flight beyond this little sphere,
Even to its source—to Thee—its Author there!"

WOMAN'S SERVICES AND RIGHTS.

F. E. Abbot:

My Dear Sir,—In your reply to the "Which?" letter in a late Index, you say, "Let the women be heard on the subject." I accept the privilege, though it seems to me that the ground has been nearly covered by your own very able "radical reasons." But first allow me to express my appreciation of your position on the woman suffrage question. I have read your Index from the first number to the last, until it seems as necessary to my life as the food which I eat; but I must confess that I have failed to discover, until lately, any hearty endorsement of the greatest reform of this age. I have often felt that your great influence, if exerted in promoting just views on this subject, would accomplish a good to which few men in this country are equal.

I shall have to treat "P.," "C. P.," and "J. H. A." collectively; in the main, indeed, they seem like the Orthodox Trinity, three in one and one in three. First I will say a word on taxation, which seems to be the burden of their souls.

When assessors go around to take account of property, every woman feels, or ought to feel, that she is the guardian of her property; that taxation and representation ought to be inseparable; that her rights are compromised by being subjected to class legislation; that officers favor those who elect them to office, and may tax her property excessively, and she has no redress whatever. Put a vote into her hand, with power to use it, and she becomes the equal of any man in electing officers.

So I repeat the axiom that taxation without representation is tyranny—a tyranny which has shown itself very conspicuously, lately, toward the Misses Smith, Abby Foster, Sarah Wall, and Marietta Flagg, by compelling them to contribute to the State beyond the measure of benefit which they receive, by denying them the right to vote for or against the officers by whom those laws are enforced.

"C. P.'s" statement that "government is based upon force, and nothing else," reminds me of the argument of a friend of mine who was an officer in our late war: "Women ought not to vote because they cannot represent the force of this country; they did not serve in the war." My answer was, Woman did good service to her country in that war. If she did not enter the ranks and shoulder the musket, to her belonged the means, to a very large degree, by which the rebellion was crushed.

To-day, while I am writing, I recall those April days of '61, when the drums beat, calling men to arms, and woman, if not to shoulder the musket, to do her part in the great drama of the war. She was not disobedient to her country's call. With a little backward glance of the mind's eye, I can see our streets thronged with women on their way to the State House to make clothing for the men of the Third Maine Regiment, which was being recruited, that they might go without delay to the front to save the capital, then menaced. The State House, from Rotunda to Representatives Hall, was filled with busy hands, and hearts fired with patriotism for their imperilled country. They worked with a zeal and earnestness for their country that the legislators who fill those seats, sometimes to little purpose, might well emulate. All through the war those women banded together to do all in their power for their country. They gave of their substance and their time without remuneration, save the consciousness, "She has done what she could;" while some of the voting citizens were busy manufacturing "paper men." I remember that I worked one Fourth of July, from morning till night, with my sewing machine, making sheets and pillow-cases, because there was a call for hospital supplies, and I was not willing that a single poor, wounded soldier should suffer from any delay of mine. I do not write this boastfully, for I did far less than many patriotic women of Augusta, and the same service and perhaps more was rendered all over the country, many women going to the front, and wherever there was a military post, to serve in hospitals, to nurse the poor soldiers back to life, or smooth their dying pillow, and hear their last messages to the dear ones at home. I know something of a soldiers' hospital, for we had one in Augusta through the war,—Augusta being the post where most of the Maine regiments rendezvoused before being called to the front. I know something of the demands and adjuncts of war, and I know that fighting is but a small part of war, and that the rebellion never would have been crushed, if it had not been for the ready and efficient aid of women.

Judging by the past, if war should ever disturb our country again I don't believe that women will be one whit behind men in patriotism and devotion. But war is an abnormal condition of a civilized nation. "Let us have peace." Let us unfurl the banner of peace, the banner of equal rights, the banner of progress, and nail it to the mast of the highest enterprise and the truest endeavor.

"C. P." states that "suffrage is based on personal liability to the State." I grant it. But are there not diversities of gifts—of qualifications—of ability? In time of peace, physical force is not in excessive demand in a State. Not many of the inhabitants are sheriffs; not many are wardens; not many are marshals; not many serve as policemen. When Mr. Simmons was nominated by the President to the office of Collector, what a no of unfitness went up from Boston! If that same Mr. Simmons had been nominated for Chief-Justice of the United States, would not a NO have been thundered from Maine to California? So, in all the departments of the body politic, persons are, or ought to be, selected with a view to fitness; and if each sex has its appropriate development, the ballot will not unsex nor degrade woman in satisfying the reasonable demands of the State. A government that is not based on reason and moral force is in great peril.

A few weeks since there was a revival preacher, Earle, in Augusta, who requested that the public schools be dismissed, that the scholars might come to his meetings and get converted. The schools were dismissed by order of one or more of the directors. I can tell "C. P." that there are interests at stake in this country which require something beside physical force. Government should exist for one end, and one alone; the good, the safety, and the rights of all.

I should think that "C. P." might acknowledge some obligation to his mother, sister, and wife, if he has them; certainly he has had a mother whom he would honor, as well as himself, by declaring that woman ought to become the social, intellectual, and political equal of man.

I say social equal, because you will not have to go outside of your own city, Boston, to see that the laws discriminate. In the annual report of 1873, the Chief of Police, Edward H. Savage, says of night-walkers: "The great injustice and moral wrong which characterize the administration of the law, in the case of this class of friendless, misguided, and unfortunate females, is repugnant to all the better feelings of humanity; and it is not well understood how an act committed by one sex, under temptations and inducements held out by the other, can be criminal on the part of the seduced and justifiable on the part of the seducer. Why a law so unequal and so unjust should be suffered to disgrace our statute books is a question remaining unanswered." Suffrage is a trust, and it is the duty of woman to assume that trust. Ought she to have less concern than a man in the laws that regulate social questions?

I say intellectual equal, because, while the best institutions of learning in the land are closed against woman, she cannot have that knowledge imparted to her which her faculties demand. She, like man, is an organic being, with powers of expansion and capacities of development. She ought to have a chance to develop her mind to the highest culture. The ballot is the guarantee of equal opportunity in a republic. Let woman have the ballot, and the highest institutions of the land will be thrown open to her, and she will not only be allowed, but invited and encouraged, to compete with men for the prizes for noble service in science, in art, in jurisprudence, in politics, in religion, and achieve for herself a grand personal independence.

I say political equal, because I see all around me and everywhere injustice done to woman because she is not included in the governing class. I see it in the action of a majority of the school committee of your city. Shame on the stolidity that would keep women from their place and work, when the people are calling loudly for more able and efficient service for the schools of Boston!

The politics of the State and the nation need moral reinforcement, and, as it is conceded that woman is more conscientious than man, she might become an important factor in the government, might become a strong ally in the right direction. She might carry into politics the great precept which the ancient sages carried into morals, Follow Nature. While helping the government to rise to a higher plane of usefulness to humanity, she would be benefitting herself in many ways, but chiefly in giving her the consciousness of her own worth, which government has done so much to suppress.

My letter is already too long; but I cannot dismiss the subject without saying a word directly to "J. H. A.," the third person in the Trinity. "Thirty years" seems a long time to wait for woman suffrage. But it is a consolation to me that in all the ages the predictions of false prophets have failed. Jonah was a notable instance. As we look back, through the lapse of time, it seems very foolish in Jonah to be so angry with the Lord, and declare that it was better for him "to die than to live" because the Lord would not destroy the city of Nineveh to fulfil his (Jonah's) insane prediction.

Who can hinder woman having the ballot? Who can seize the wheel-spokes of destiny, and say to the spirit of the times, "Turn back, I command thee?"

PATIENCE COMMONSENSE.

AUGUSTA, Maine, March 21, 1874.

NATURE AND HUMANITY.

There is a vast difference between the actions of Nature and human ideals of conduct. This difference, vast as it is, is less than it was, and probably will diminish in the future, until a reconciliation is attained.

Humanity wants protection from the consequences of ignorance, charity for wrong-doing, and mercy for weakness; and none of these things do we see in Nature around us. We see the strong conquering the weak, the cunning outstripping the simple, and the fittest, not the noblest, surviving. Now, the unfit are brought into existence by the same forces that make the fit; and the former suffer, while the latter enjoy. We may as well face the fact that much evil exists, apparently without compensation; there may be compensation, and we may hope there is; but, if we do not see it, why not say just that?

Many suppose that by discarding religion they are doing well; but religion in the main is founded on human nature and experience. There may be no God nor devil, heaven nor hell; but there are, in our present stage of evolution, what correspond to these things. The trouble is not so much with religion as with the facts it interprets. What is the devil but the evil we can see no balance for? What is the belief in a future state but the expression of dissatisfaction with the present modes of government, and the hope therefrom arising, that they shall be adjusted according to our notions in time?

Now, as we must first recognize that we are in and of universal Nature, we must see that the attempt to judge it as if we were outside of it is absurd; and conclude that, if our ideals of human actions and our observations of the actions of Nature are not in accord, it must be because of incomplete correspondence between man and his environment, which shall gradually disappear with evolution.

It may be that our complaints originate in what Herbert Spencer might call a "human bias;" humanity is ranged in its interests against all else, and desires a special advantage which it does not get, and which it shall cease to desire as it grows wiser. Again: we of this generation profit in some respects by what cost our predecessors apparently unbalanced ill; and we pay for it by enduring the like in favor of future men, who may utilize us as examples, if they cannot as models.

The gradual harmonization of ideals and facts is marked in our day by the decline of faith in altruism, and the increase of faith that, as the interests of the unit and the whole are identical, and as the interests of the unit are what he best knows, the following of them is productive of best results to the whole.

"THE NAME" AGAIN.

I have read your inquiries at the end of my short article on "The Name." I proposed five queries which neither you nor any one else seems to care to answer. You propose two queries to me. I will try properly to answer both.

1st. "Would our correspondent have advised the Free Religious Association to dub itself 'The Men' at the start?" To this I answer: this is not a correct question. Your correspondent was not accoucheur at the birth of, nor did he have the honor to stand in any way as sponsor for, the newborn infant. But I would not advise any society to "dub itself" by any name that could by any possibility have a sectarian significance. Is the Free Religious Association free from this? "The Illini" is, so far as I can see, perfectly free in its significance from any sectarian bias whatever. I would urgently advise all men to be Illini. Humanity in its highest elevation has no higher goal to which to point. In its lowest depths, with the shackles of superstition, vice, and consequent degradation repressing it, yet still it raises its fetters toward God, and claims the indefeasible right of manhood. You hear the vilest criminals claiming that they are men. You hear the veriest slaves of vice and passion claiming the same divine heritage. Manhood is the goal to which the highest aspirations of the Christian, the Brahmin, the Buddhist, the Mahometan, the Pagan, all aspire. The Human is this planet's expression of the Divine.

2d. "How can it (the Free Religious Association) now modify its name so as to merit his unqualified approval?" I answer: this does not seem to me to be the best form of inquiry. It may not be a matter of any importance to the Free Religious Association whether I approve its name and objects or not. But as it is one of the foremost and most urgent advocates for the regard and support of the votaries of truth pure and simple, it is a matter of the last importance that it should come before them without the smell of sectarian fire on its garments. Do you thus present the Free Religious Association? Religion is one of the qualities of a fully developed man. Without it he cannot be a full, true man. Therefore it is an adjunct of, or, if you please, one of the elements in, true manhood. Shall we name the whole by a part? I wait for your answer.

E. H. B.

[The name of the Free Religious Association was selected with a special intention to avoid sectarianism, and no name seems less easily pervertible to sectarian uses. The name "Illini" would soon have become as sectarian as any other, in addition to being pedantic and unintelligible. We entirely sympathize with our correspondent's desire to escape the slightest taint of sectarianism; and our interest in the Free Religious Association is due to this very desire. Practically, every association must have some name; and its name must soon become identified with its purposes and spirit. Our correspondent does not seem to consider the impossibility of preventing any name whatever from being thus colored in the popular mind, and therefore becoming applicable to only a part of the race. Certainly it is a pitiable spirit of injustice that insists on discerning sectarianism in an association which was founded to abolish it and consecrated from the start to the broadest and most comprehensive humanity. We repeat, what name can our correspondent suggest that would not at once be as open to objection on this score as the name of the Free Religious Association?—ED.]

"LAW AND LOVE."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Will you allow me to thank "T. W. H." for his article in your last issue headed, "Law and Love"? And especially for telling us that he does not intend to surrender his emotions or (as I understand him) his experience at the demand of science. Surely the word religion means something.

The Catholic points me to his church. The Protestant hands me his book, and calls it "The Book." The scientist tells me of a something which is unseen and unknowable, and asks me—very kindly—to wait till he has time to scale the mountain-top, that he may see the unseen, and then, perhaps——

Now I am an old man, uneducated, without means. What shall I do?

The Church is a usurpation; "The Book" to me is but a book, and I find myself alone in the midst of uncertainty. In despair, I turn to my own soul. What is the unseen, the unknown force? Sweetly comes the answer, "Goodness—the Good. Goodness is power, goodness is wisdom, goodness is life, goodness is immortal." Then I respond, I will seek the highest good. I will be good and do good in my own way, and encourage all others to be good and do good in their own way. While I maintain my own freedom, I will respect the freedom of all others. And this is what I mean by Free Religion.

HENRY PALPHIAMAND.

CANTON, Pa., April 22, 1874.

ONE of the lachrymose and surface-agitated religious journals—the Evangelist, of New York,—as usual on such occasions, prints this wretched stuff pertinent to the death of Senator Sumner:—

"We must confess to a feeling of pain as we read the story of his last hours, not for anything that he said, but for what he did not say and apparently did not feel. For some hours before he ceased to breathe he knew that the end was near. His friends were around his bedside, and the dark shadow was coming over him. And yet, in that awful hour, when the earth was sinking away beneath his feet, and the curtain was about to rise on the great future, and usher him into a state of being compared with which all the interests of this world are so mean and small, he could think only of his literary fame, and regret that he had not lived to complete the edition of his works. It is a last confession of personal vanity and littleness that we wish we had been spared in the memory of the departed. Not so died Daniel Webster. When the last hour drew near, as he lay on his bed at Marshfield, fluttering between life and death, and sometimes whispering 'I still live!' as if to assure himself that he had not crossed the dark river, his mind went back to his childhood and the prayers and hymns he had learned at his mother's knee, and he was heard murmuring, 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me.' And so, once more a child again, and leaning on an Almighty arm, he went down into the dark valley. Would that we had some such parting word from Sumner! And yet we cannot doubt that, like his friend Agassiz, if he spoke not much of these things, he believed in an Almighty Creator and in the great hereafter."

What wretched bolstering-up denominational pretence needs! Here is Sumner, whose whole life was of purity, justice, righteousness—no scandal attaching to his acts or thoughts, truly a white soul, living with God day-by-day in all that was high in aspiration and noble in purpose,—compared disadvantageously with a man whose moral and pecuniary reputation were under a cloud continually; because, forsooth, on his death-bed, after living a life of practical religion, he did not ostentatiously make a profession of that of which his whole life had been a conspicuous illustration! Before editors of "religious" journals indite flapdoodle, they should inquire into the private character of some of their heroes.—Commonwealth.

IS THIS OLD? If not, it is neat. It is told of two members of the New South Wales Legislature, by the Melbourne Herald: These wiseacres were arguing in the Parliament refreshment room, when the following colloquy ensued: First member: "You blow about edication! Why, I don't believe as how you ever had two penn'orth of schoolin' in your life!" Second member: "I knows more about it nor you do anyway. Why, I don't believe you can repeat the Lord's Prayer!" First member: "I'm game to bet a fiver I can, come now." Second member: "Done; stake the money." The cash being duly posted on either side, the second member remarked: "Now, then, begin." First member: "'I believe in God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in'"— Second member: "That'll do. You've won the money, but I'm blessed if I thought you knew it."—London Spectator.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

SABBATH SCHOOL SONG BOOK!

Triumphant Success of the New and Beautiful Sabbath-school Song Book, the RIVER OF LIFE!!

BY H. S. PERKINS AND W. W. BENTLEY.

This undoubtedly fine book has been but a short time before the public, and the public is already convinced of its surpassing merit. Witness the great sales—many thousands. Witness the decided words of praise from hundreds of Sabbath-school workers in all directions.

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Superintendent in Charleston, S.C., says: "We pronounce it the best book we have ever used."

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Clergyman in Philadelphia is "Greatly pleased with it."

RIVER OF LIFE!

A Secretary of a Sabbath School Union, in Illinois, believes it "Surpasses any other I have examined."

These are but a few out of a multitude of commendations.

No book of the kind issued for many years has given greater or more universal satisfaction.

Specimen Copies mailed, post-paid, for 30 cents. Price by the Hundred Copies, $30. Sold by all dealers.

BUST OF THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished n plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

THE BOSTON Liberal League will hold its next meeting at Parker Fraternity Hall, to-morrow (Friday) evening.

A RADICAL CLUB has been organized in Cambridge, in this State; with John McDuffie, President, and Harry W. Stevens, Secretary.

IT IS ANNOUNCED, evidently by authority, that Charles Bradlaugh will again visit this country, next fall, and will lecture as before.

THE FRENCH ecclesiastics wish to canonize Joan of Arc. If Joan "still lives," she has by this time got far beyond the range of their canons.

IT IS AT LAST explained why some people do not mind their own business. One says it is because they haven't any business; and another that it is because they haven't any mind. We are entirely satisfied.

A BILL has been ordered to a third reading in the Massachusetts House of Representatives for the establishment of a separate prison for women. Is this in accordance with the co-education-of-the-sexes theory?

THE METHODIST CHURCH South has a membership of 680,000; that of the North a membership of 1,367,000. There is an effort now being made to reunite these two Churches in one, they having been separated on the question of slavery before the late war.

REV. BERIAH GREEN, an old-time anti-slavery reformer, died in Whitestown, N.Y., May 6. Mr. Green was an able man, and a somewhat noted preacher. He was one of the most aged men on the list of THE INDEX subscribers, being over eighty years old when he died.

BOSTON and other Northern cities have been very generous to Louisiana, in her time of trial. We are heartily glad of it. These forth-stretched hands of sympathy will go far to "bridge the bloody chasm" of the war. The souls of Horace Greeley and Charles Sumner "go marching on."

THOSE who have never been so fortunate as to hear Henry James' essay on Thomas Carlyle are to be commiserated. It is one of the most entertaining, racy, witty, and wise biographical sketches we ever listened to. The Second Radical Club had the pleasure of hearing it last Monday evening.

THE National Reformer of London, England, says: "The increase of infanticide in this country is really saddening. Scarcely a week passes but the papers report instances of this wretched crime." This condition of things has led to the preparation of a bill, by interested parties, to be presented to Parliament, entitled "The Law of Infanticide."

WE ARE not much in favor of legislation; but we have heard of one proposed law which we think we shall favor. A friend of ours suggests that it be enacted that every man over fifty years of age shall cease from labor. We shall not, for several years, come under the provision of that law; but when we do we shall certainly claim the benefit of its benign protection.

MR. S. H. MORSE has just finished a small bust of Charles Sumner, which, we think, must become very popular. Many who were long and intimately acquainted with the great Senator have pronounced a most favorable opinion upon Mr. Morse's work; and its low price of three dollars will bring it within the reach of those of limited means, who yet desire so admirable a memento of Mr. Sumner.

A FRIEND of ours thinks that the statement that "the Church should enjoy immunity from taxes, on the ground that it is the chief source of the good morals in the State," is like the good opinion which that foreigner entertained of himself, who, on arriving in this country, notified the people that he would consent to dwell in a first-class family where his board would be considered balanced by his good society!

A LETTER written from New Orleans to a friend of ours says: "We are sorely afflicted with too much water, and complain loudly about it. It is a singular fact that we never make complaint here of inundation, except it is by water. Although we are up to our eyes in bad whiskey, yet this never makes us unhappy!" There is much in being used to a thing. The New Orleans people are accustomed to providing for an abundance of whiskey, but the taking of so much water as has come upon them of late is contrary to all their habits.

WE FIND in the "Inquiring Friends'" column of the Christian Union the following very extraordinary question and sensible answer:—

Question.—I am endeavoring to be a Christian. I love a beautiful lady who appears to me a model of perfection, and when a temptation is presented to me to do wrong, or an opportunity to do good, I feel her influence seemingly before that of my Savior; am I an idolater?

Answer.—If your love drew you toward evil instead of toward good, and you preferred to please the object of your love rather than Christ, you would be an idolater. But if you have a human love that lifts you toward what is good, praise God and be happy.

THE STORY of Rev. Dr. Kirk's "conversion" is published in The Congregationalist of May 7. When, in early manhood, he was "seeking religion," and experiencing great difficulty in finding it, he applied to a certain Dr. Spring for counsel. "He conversed and prayed with me," says Dr. Kirk, who was then a law-student. "I was conscious of utter insensibility. His parting advice was: 'Leave your law-office. Go to your room. Determine never to leave it except as a Christian or a corpse!'" This sounds very much like the desperate alternative which a highwayman offers to the traveller: "Your money or your life!" Dr. Kirk (who says he "accepted the advice" of Dr. Spring) presented this dilemma to his Savior: Salvation or suicide! "Either save my soul," said the young law-student, "or behold me slay myself!" We marvel that the Savior was not brought to terms in this way; but he was not,—for, according to the narrative, Dr. Kirk left his room neither a Christian nor a corpse, and it was not until four days afterward, and in another place, that he finally got converted!

DURING the illness of Mr. Austin Holyoake, recently deceased in London, Mr. Bradlaugh gave weekly information, through his paper, of Mr. Holyoake's condition, and various items of interest connected with his sickness. In the National Reformer of April 5, we find the following occurrence noted:—

On Monday last an attempt was made by a stranger to obtain access to his bedside. This stranger was a tall, dark, gentlemanly, fair-spoken man. He saw Mrs. Holyoake, and asked, as a special favor, to be allowed to see her husband. She replied that it was impossible, as he was too weak to see even friends or relatives. The stranger then said that his name was McGregor, and that he used to write in the Reasoner. Seeing the gentleman so anxious for the interview, Mr. Holyoake was communicated with, and he observed that there must be some mistake, as he had no recollection of any freethinker of that name writing in the Reasoner. Hereupon the gentleman changed his tone, and began to talk religion. He said he trusted that Mrs. Holyoake prayed for her husband, to which she retorted: "Indeed, I do not, but I work for him; and this is much more likely to alleviate his sufferings." No doubt this was an ingenious Christian attempt to gain the bedside of an atheist; and, had it succeeded, a "powerful exhortation" would have been delivered for his conversion, even at the risk of the life of the patient.

Remarks on Tax-Exemption

BEFORE THE MASSACHUSETTS COMMITTEE ON JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION, AT THE FINAL HEARING IN THE STATE HOUSE, MARCH 26, 1874.

BY CHARLES E. PRATT, ESQ.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen:—

I have already, on another occasion, urged before you the grounds upon which these petitioners plant their claims to the relief asked for. I endeavored to show you from statistics, from authorities, and from common sense and logic, that the present tax-exemption statutes are out of harmony with our constitutional guaranties and the spirit of our laws and institutions; that, as affording indirect appropriations, they are unjust and unwise; that, as affecting the matter of taxation, they violate the first principles of constitutional law and sound political economy; and that their continuance involves a matter of conscience, and is oppressive in the light of political ethics and in violation of religious liberty.

I now take the liberty of submitting to you, on behalf of the petitioners, this draft of a bill,* which I conclude, after close examination of the statutes, will, if reported in substance by you and passed by the General Court, secure substantially what is asked. At least it may serve you as a basis upon which to compare notes, in framing one of your own.

Without commenting now upon the several clauses, let me simply say that the last clause of this draft is intended to secure a year of grace to the institutions which may be affected. It will overcome the objection of some that the change we seek would seriously affect the financial ability of such institutions. Under such an act as this, they would have a year in which to adapt themselves to the new régime; and so, by greater economy in useless and ornamental expenditures, and by greater thrift, enterprise, and activity incited by their independence, as well as through the large and generous benevolence of their friends among the people of Massachusetts, who never yet allowed a worthy charity to fail for want of dollars, they will find themselves ready with sufficient funds in a year from next May to pay their own taxes, and (let us hope) with a great deal more.

Mr. Abbot and Mr. Ranney have already answered with great cogency and aptness some of the arguments and notions of the opposition, and have brought the question back to its proper issues. I shall try not to repeat what they have already so well said in the suggestions I have to offer; and the time admonishes me to be brief and rapid, for your attention must soon be turned to the choice of a Senator.

The main facts in the matter are as follows: $2,250,000 must be assessed annually upon persons and property in this State for public purposes.

Five-sixths of that amount must be assessed upon property.

The Constitution, the spirit of our laws, and the principles of natural justice require that this assessment shall be made equally and proportionally upon all the estates lying within the Commonwealth.

The special report of the Tax Commissioner shows that, under cover of exceptional statutes now in force, there is an amount of property exempted from taxation—

In meeting-houses	$28,853,745
In educational inst'ns other than public schools,	13,025,945
Other institutions	6,129,410
An aggregate of	$48,009,100

$14.50 on $1000 being the average rate of taxes, there is an annual inequality of taxation in the State of $696,131.95. That means an indiscriminate appropriation of more than $696,000 to the various churches and charities.

This appropriation is not made in the usual way—after consideration, for a definite object, and one that is within the acknowledged and legitimate scope of our legislation, and apportioned in amount to the needs of the case,—is not an outlay correlative to the good to be secured, and therefore I say indiscriminate.

The petitioners ask for a repeal of the statutes which permit this appropriation by exemption, and which also excuse so many abuses as are known to exist under them.

To state their case is sufficient, until some reasonable ground is shown for not granting their prayer, because the statutes are exceptional and in their nature only permissive,—a license, to be withdrawn when no justification is shown for its continuance.

What have the remonstrants shown against repeal?

First. Special cases of anticipated hardship are pointed out by representatives of different institutions, from whose statements I take some facts for the purpose of this hearing. The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, chartered in 1829, holds now four chapels, worth $150,000, and employs "six male and female missionaries." It holds property to-day, besides the chapels, free from taxation, amounting to an income of $2,000.

$13,000 is raised from nine Unitarian churches. If the chapels were taxed, the tax would be $1,920.

"Boston could better afford them a subsidy," says Rev. Mr. Foote, because "they educate people out of intemperance and poverty, to law-abiding, tax-paying citizens."

I was surprised to see Mr. Foote take that side of the question. Most of his denomination are on the other.

Harvard University was chartered in 1640.

Its property is not all exempt, says Mr. Crowninshield, for, when all its buildings now in process of erection are completed, it will pay taxes on $1,200,000 of property!

It bought a piece of land on the Charles River (exempt), not to speculate with, but because it was thought possible that in the future a public park would be formed from this property, and facilities for the boating interests of the college furnished!

Then the Bussey Farm: $7,000 to $9,000 a year will be expended upon that, to make it a beautiful park which the public will be allowed to enjoy! "The city would gladly pay $1,000,000 for the estate to be used as a public park, but they are to have it merely for the taxes upon it!" says the eloquent advocate, Mr. Crowninshield.

The taxes on the property of the college would be about $48,000 now. Certainly that institution is not impecunious enough to be a pauper; and moreover can wield influence enough to obtain appropriations, if it need.

Then comes an advocate for Williams College. That, too, has a charter, and property to the amount of $480,000, and would have to pay a tax of $4,000. Mr. White says that the interest of $7,500 is applied annually (that is, about $450) to the aid of indigent students; and asks, "Does the State wish to come in and say that it is ashamed to assist indigent young men?"

Many men in the State pay ten times that amount every year to educate their own children, and others; will Mr. White say that their property ought to be exempt?

Amherst College, too, is represented as a deserving charity, and does not want to lose its subsidy.

So all these mendicants, these respectable deadheads, will come trooping up here, and ask that their neighbors still pave their ways, and light their streets, and guard their treasures, and protect their rights for them, whilst they thrive on this invidious advantage—an advantage given without reference to merit or accomplishment, and without any opportunity left to the people to direct the expenditure of their money.

Perhaps the strongest of all claims urged were in favor of the Massachusetts General Hospital, with its $2,600,000 worth of property, which would be taxed about $38,000.

And the instance of this creature of charity, which so abundantly dispenses its healing and life-saving influences to the sick and the unfortunate, the poor and the friendless, this exceptional instance, suggests one answer to all: Let the State grant a direct appropriation to whatever applicant shall prove itself to be truly a public, general, free, open institution, and meritorious enough to deserve it.

Special and exceptional instances of hardship are not allowed to defeat general projects, or laws, for the public good. You put through a street or a railroad, though it turn the widow and the aged from their homes; and the military draft takes the only son and the young husband and father. But the principle is particularly correct, when, as in this case, the special cases may be met in another way, without inconvenience or violation of principle.

Second. The general grounds upon which the remonstrants found their arguments, when they seem to have any foundation other than the wings of rhetoric, are:—

1. These institutions are a benefit to the community; that is, they educate, and conserve the morals of the people, and they raise the value of adjacent property.

Well, we are accustomed to say and to think, those of us who are right-minded, at least, that institutions which are not beneficial to the community ought not to exist at all.

Every worthy object or enterprise is a benefit to the community. Our boards of trade,—are they exempt because beneficial? Commercial colleges, Horticultural Hall, of this city, Mechanics Hall, of Worcester, and other examples, might be cited, all through the Commonwealth, of buildings noble for their beneficent educational influence.

There are the "Handel and Haydn Society," and the "Apollo Club," and the "Harvard Musical Association,"—all generous in their good influences, and sublime in the lofty sentiments and refined culture which they inspire and propagate. Carl Zerrahn, and Theodore Thomas, and Eben Tourjee—tell me what clergyman of them all does more for the State than they?

Mr. Hallowell, in a terse and careful argument read before the committee, has shown with great force of reasoning that "the Church is not the only institution of society which protects and develops social welfare;" and cites as instances:—

The press.

Private schools, of which the annual cost in this State is $423,186.50, and which, not teaching sectarian theology, are inculcating more good morals, good manners, and golden rules than the Sunday-schools.

The lyceum, with sessions every day in the week, and overflowing rooms.

Now I say that you cannot exempt the churches, either any or all of them, because they support religion; for our Constitution forbids the establishment or support of any religion,—that is, of any sectarian religion, such as the churches support. If you exempt them because they conserve good morals and public safety, that is too much of a reason, because a thousand other institutions do the same thing; and where would exemption cease?

As to the charitable institutions, the same query applies; many a private citizen expends thousands in charities every year. How much shall he spend to have his estate exempt? If he supports an evening school, or teaches a Sunday-school, or opens a library, a park, or a garden, or makes a bequest to the public, shall other men pay his taxes? Exempt the hospitals and the missionary societies, and such, and up come the Free Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, Patrons of Industry, the Yacht Club, the Somerset Club, the Printers' Association, the Swedenborg Club, the good disciples of St. Patrick, the two Radical Clubs; and even the Index Association may be here (with hoofs and horns, frisking their tails, as one honorable gentleman would seem to expect), all asking exemption because they are charitable.

One further remark upon this point: The benefits of these institutions are limited in their direct bestowment to a part of the public. They are not open, free, appropriated by all alike, as highways and public schools are.

And this leads to the claim of some remonstrants that—

2. Churches and charitable institutions are public, devoted to public uses.

Not even in the sense that railroads are! for these are free to all who choose to pay the fares, and make no distinctions or requisitions; they are of incalculable public benefit, for they make both secular and charitable and religious advancement possible.

The charitable institutions are only for certain classes of the people.

The churches prescribe various requirements of those who would fully enjoy their benefits; they will only seat one-half of the people, if filled to their utmost. If the sittings were all free, like those of the Quakers, and of the Church of the Disciples in this city, there would be a better reason for calling them public institutions. The pews in most are costly, and the contributions required are large. They are exclusive and sectarian. The pulpits are not free, nor are they allowed to be filled by the choice of different classes. The people do not select the pastors. They are private enterprises, run by a few individuals in each for their own entertainment, profit, power, or aggrandizement. Like most other private institutions, they have their revenues, and their officers and employés, who derive their livelihood therefrom. So far as they furnish employment and salaries for their officers and employés, they are on a footing with mercantile institutions, and the revenues of some of them are large. True, they are not very well paying for the amount of capital invested, because they are generally occupied scarcely more than one day in the week, and the capital put into them is more for ornament and luxury than for utility. They are in a certain sense but a sort of religious club-houses; and they are luxurious and fashionable ones, which only the well-to-do can afford—and, mind you, the more luxurious and fashionable they are, the more of a subsidy they get under the present exemption laws. They are not, therefore, in a true sense public institutions, in distinction from private. But if they were, it would be unjust to exempt them, and tax the railroads, the ferries, the gas companies, and so on to the end of the list.

3. It is said that churches, etc., are some of them non-productive property, and others have their property invested in securities paying small returns. The distinction between productive and non-productive property is not usually well taken.

That is unproductive property which finds no accretion, which yields no benefit, begets nothing, bears no fruit, renders no reward for its possession.

Money lying in coffers, unsalable and unusable materials, lands lying waste, and unoccupied build

*AN ACT IN FURTHERANCE OF JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION.

BE IT ENACTED by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

Section 1. The third, seventh, and ninth clauses of the fifth section of chapter eleven of the General Statutes are hereby repealed.

Section 2. The second section of chapter thirty of the General Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: viz., "Provided, however, that no property or estate owned or held by such societies shall be exempt from taxation."

Section 3. The fifth section of chapter thirty-two of the General Statutes is hereby amended by striking out all after the word "case" in the second line.

Section 4. The first section of chapter two hundred and six of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five is hereby amended by striking out all after the word "value."

Section 5. This act shall take effect upon the first day of June next after its passage.

ings (unless held for a rise in value in good localities), are examples of non-productive property.

But buildings put to constant good uses are productive; so are libraries, works of art, houses, horses, and carriages.

The good argument of our friends, that these institutions are a benefit to the State, contains the concession that they are productive to those immediately interested in them and under their influences,—productive of enjoyment, refinement, present and future happiness, health, character, rise in value of adjacent property. Their value increases upon itself, until a little investment becomes, in the course of years, enormous wealth. And this property is frequently held by a small class, until at last it is divided between two or three survivors.

Besides, church property gives men influence and importance in the community, and it has always been a good investment in a worldly sense to be a member of a church, and own a pew, and be a deacon. It is even a recommendation for collectors of customs!

Longfellow makes the landlord of the "Three Mariners" tell the truth, and speak the importance of such investments, in the New England Tragedy:—

> "I am a law-abiding citizen;
> I have a seat in the new meeting-house,
> A cow-right on the common, and, besides,
> Am corporal in the great artillery."

But is it, then, a good excuse for exemption, that property pays small returns? You do not make it so with individuals. You tax unbuilded Back Bay lands, and untilled acres in Berkshire. Unoccupied houses, club-rooms and buildings, yachts, horses, gardens, books, money on deposit, and all possessions of luxury or enjoyment are taxed to private individuals. It is, then, a new theory that such property ought not to be taxed because it does not yield an income in dollars.

4. It is said: The right to tax implies the right to annihilate the property taxed. Begin to tax and you begin to destroy.

This argument is fallacious as it is frantic.

The State has no right to annihilate any property. For purely public purposes it may exercise the right of eminent domain; and this it has always done. When it wanted to put a railroad through, it would pull down or remove a church or a cemetery as soon as any other property.

But our Declaration of Rights is a perpetual protection against the taking of property for any but necessary public uses (and that only by paying for it), and against any annihilation or destruction.

To point to that is sufficient answer to this argument.

5. "It is sacrilege to tax the churches," cry some.

I have seen an answer in the Congregationalist, so plain and ingenuous that I wish to produce it here, directed against this "plea that meeting-houses, because they are consecrated to God, should be free of taxation. If our readers will excuse the apparent irreverence of the remark, until it be explained—this is the argument of heathenism, and not of Christianity. The old Pagan law declared: Nullius autem sunt res sacrae, et religiosae et sanctae; quod enim divini juris est, id nullius in bonis est (Justinian. Lib. ii., Tit. 1): 'Things sacred, religious and holy, are the property of no one; for that which belongs to God cannot belong to man.' And then it went on to define 'things sacred,' as being aedes sacrae, et donaria, quae rite ad ministerium Dei dedicata sunt: 'Temples and offerings, properly consecrated to the service of God.' It was thus the genius of Paganism to dissociate sacred things from common things, and it was the Pagan element in Romanism which segregated monks and nuns from the masses of the people, and made men think that common life and special holiness must of necessity be disjoined. The spirit of genuine Christianity directly antagonizes all this. It teaches that eating and drinking, and all things, may be, and ought to be, done to the glory of God; that the saintliest saint must be par excellence the best citizen; and so, instead of driving God out of the State by thrusting him up into a plane higher than that in which it lives and moves and has its being, it not only welcomes the thought of partnership between him and his, and it and its, but the ideal State will not be satisfied until the Lord come into it by a real though unannounced presence, as into his own temple; until the Shekinah of perfect justice, absolute truth, and radiant righteousness fill the nation in all its capitols, and courts, and offices, and works, with its benignant and regnant glory; and, so far from exempting from taxation a few things because they are particularly supposed to be consecrated to God and to belong to him, all taxable things will be his, and 'Holiness to the Lord' shall be written on the very bells of the horses, 'yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of Hosts,' and 'all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord,' and he shall no more be a God that is afar off, but a God that is near."

6. It is inexpedient to tax them because they would not survive it.

Are they really paupers, then? Do they depend upon a State support which is measured by the remitted tax? If a church is so poor and its communicants so penurious that it cannot pay its taxes, let it be given up. Or, rather, let the churches expend less upon fine architecture, and elegant decorations, and costly music, and vain holiday wastes; and let them live as they tell their members to, within the bounds of their income.

The generous community will see to it that they have enough to pay their taxes with; and it is the opinion of many, more pious than myself, that the churches will wake to greater life and activity for the stimulus of independence. They will utilize their property better. Let them have a year's notice (as the offered bill provides), and the money will be all ready a year from next October.

This may also induce a more judicious manner of leaving bequests.

7. It is argued that to tax these institutions is to add to the burdens of the poor, because they will feel it most.

Now those who have money build the churches and found institutions; and they also support them who are able. To tax them is to tax those who own them; that is, the rich.

Again, so much must be paid in taxes. The poor man pays his proportion, as well as the rich. Reduce the rate, and you tax the poor man less. If you tax all the property, that is, more property, the rate will be less, and the poor man's tax lighter.

The poor man, scarcely able to own the equity of his small house, must pay taxes both on his cottage and on the costly church opposite, which he never visits. The wrong and hardship is in the present exemption.

8. Judge Warren says they are doing the work of the State, and therefore ought to be exempt.

Pray what is the work of the State? Is it the work of the State to teach sectarian theology, to perpetuate ceremonies, to support a class of ministers, to raise buildings for the gratification, pride, and quarrel of special neighborhoods, to minister to all the moral and physical wants of the people, to perpetuate exclusiveness of ideas and of association and of property, or even to send missionaries and get up revivals?

Our Declaration of Rights asserts that "government is instituted for the common good, for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men. (Art. VII.)

9. Because our fathers exempted them. They have heretofore been exempt.

That is, simply, because a thing has been done, it must be done. For if you go further, and show that our fathers had good reasons, and those reasons still exist, you put the question upon other grounds.

Our fathers did many things which we cannot do. They compelled the support of churches, and then compelled the attendance of everybody,—Protestant ones, too, they must be. They wouldn't let a man hold office unless he held the prevailing Orthodox religious faith and membership. They exempted the property of ministers from taxation, as well as that of churches. They pressed Spiritualists to death, and cut off the ears of Quakers, and hung them. All these ideas are rather old-fashioned now.

But it is sufficient to rely upon the moral axiom that, If a thing is wrong, no citation of precedents can make it right.

10. Because this demand originates in the Index Association. (P. A. Collins.)

One remonstrant was so rash and ignorant and uncharitable as to exclaim that "there was not in this nation one true and faithful minister of the Church of God who is in favor of taxing church property."

The best paper I have seen upon the subject is one in favor of non-exemption, prepared by the Rev. Frederick B. Allen, and read at a Congregational ministers' meeting, last month. From Baptist to Unitarian, from Free Religionist to Roman Catholic, they are all coming to see the matter in a better light, and swelling the majority in favor of justice and equality in taxation.

The best and ablest of the religious press of the State are not only educating their readers for it, as a thing soon coming, but also expressing their reasons and sentiments to hasten it. And I know of no better words to quote than those of one who was both an excellent doctor of divinity and a popular and learned political economist. The late Francis Wayland, D.D., President of Brown University, in his excellent elementary treatise on political economy, thus speaks of the subject of governmental aid to religious property (Elements of Political Economy, page 403):—

"It cannot be proved that the Christian religion needs the support of civil government, since it has existed and flourished when entirely deprived of this support.

"And if it be said that every man derives benefit from religious services, inasmuch as these services improve the moral and intellectual character of his neighbors, and hence, that every man ought to pay for their maintenance, the argument may be easily met as follows: It is granted that every man is benefitted by the regular administration of the ordinances of religion, but this is not the reason for which these ordinances are established. Men unite with their neighbors to procure religious instruction for their own benefit, and not for the benefit of others. If it happen, accidentally, that others are benefitted, it does not follow that they are obliged to pay for this benefit. If my neighbor erect a building for his own profit, on his own land, and thus improve my property, I am not obliged to unite in defraying the expenses of his building. I am entitled gratuitously to this accidental advantage. I think the same principle applies to the case in question.

* * * * * *

"All that religious societies have a right to ask of the civil government is, the same privileges for transacting their own affairs which societies of every other sort possess. This they have a right to demand, not because they are religious societies, but because the exercise of religion is an innocent mode of pursuing happiness."

But not upon these, Mr. Chairman, not upon these arguments and refutations do we rely for the vindication of our cause. We take no negative. We stand upon an affirmation of principle which has been growing into recognition in our civil institutions and laws from baronial times.

Gentlemen of various occupations and walks in life, of various possessions, and of various religious persuasions, have been before you with their facts, and the best results of their observation and thought.

I should be happy to bring their testimony again before you in a condensed and orderly summary, but the waning hour forbids, and I must be still more brief.

From an examination of the General Statutes we were able to show not only how the law now stands, but what progress and what direction of progress has already been made in just and equal law-making.

From such an examination, with reference to this subject, it is readily seen that the several exemptions may all be referred to some one of six general classes of property, to wit:—

1. That of the United States.

There are two sufficient reasons for not taxing this; namely, because the United States has by the Constitution exclusive legislation over its own lands, and because to tax such property would be to tax the means which the general government employs in the execution of its acknowledged powers.

2. That which is taken and held for the public uses of the Commonwealth and all its inhabitants.

To tax this would be but taking money from one till and putting it into another in the same treasury.

3. That which is within the actual necessities of humble life.

I think the quality of legislative mercy is not strained by such indulgence.

4. That which is actually occupied in and about the purposes of burial of the dead.

The wealth lavished upon some of our cemeteries might, perhaps, well be taxed to the living who pile it there; but it would be an undesirable contingency of fame to have one's tombstones advertised for nonpayment of taxes when one is himself beyond the jurisdiction. And yet I think that large incorporated cemeteries, speculative and profitable hoards of great wealth and luxury, ought to be taxed.

5. That which is devoted to educational purposes, including literary, scientific and agricultural.

6. That which is in the use of religious societies for worship, and for purposes technically called benevolent and charitable.

It is to these last two classes that the preceding facts and calculations apply, and particularly to the latter class; and I have addressed myself especially to the latter class, because all the arguments pertinent to the next preceding apply to it, and because there are other reasons peculiarly cogent and applicable to the discussion of these unequal and unjust so-styled religious exemption laws.

The facts being as before stated, it is obvious that this large sum of $696,000, annually released to the churches and their charges, is to be considered both as an appropriation and as an indirect taxation.

As an appropriation this exemption is indiscriminate and unwise.

It gives the rich societies more than it gives the poor ones.

It gives $250 to a struggling young missionary free church at the South End, and to an opulent society on the Back Bay $4,350.

It heaps upon the cities where so many advantages are enjoyed, and passes grudgingly over the toiling and ill-provided country towns.

Whether a church is needed or not, or used or not; whether it is devoted to the best interests of the community or not; whether it is for the perpetuation of such principles as the majority would approve or not; the State says, For every $1000 you have I will give you $14.50.

But it is also an appropriation for other than public uses; namely, private uses.

The restrictions of membership, and the limitations of enjoyment of church and charitable property, have been already briefly indicated. Frequently, by succession and the various vicissitudes that befall, a very few take the whole accumulation of years.

The State has no right to appropriate the public money to private uses, either by constitutional law, common law, or the principles of natural justice and equity.

This leads to the root of the question; namely:—

As a matter of taxation, it is unfair, unequal, unjust, unconstitutional, and against liberty of conscience and religious freedom.

I had the honor of discussing the question before you in its bearings upon constitutional law. I cited passages from the Constitution of the State and of the United States, and from acknowledged authorities in jurisprudence; and from the attention you were pleased to give at that time, I think the principal points and authorities must still be before you, in your notes if not in your memories. Through all, like a key-note with its various chords, run "uniform," "proportional," "reasonable," "fair," "just and equable," "with equality upon all the estates," "without undue assessment or undue advantage to any class of persons or property."

By its five necessary and universal limitations a lawful tax must be:—

1. By consent of the people.
2. For public purposes only.
3. Reasonable.
4. In its levy equal and proportional.
5. Not higher upon any one species of property than upon another of equal value.

And we have shown you that taxation in this State, under the present exemption statutes, is in violation of four out of these five constitutional requisites.

No wonder, then, that we recur with keener sense of their fitness to the words of Chancellor Kent: "It is not sufficient that no tax can be imposed upon the citizens but by their representatives in the Legislature. The citizens are entitled to require that the Legislature itself shall cause all public taxation to be fair and equal in proportion to the value of property, so that no one class of individuals, and no one species of property, may be unequally or unduly assessed." (II. Kent Comm., 331.)

But there is another, and to many a weightier, principle of ethics involved in this question; namely, freedom of conscience. I think this has been sufficiently elucidated and insisted upon, without much farther comment. The right to worship God as one's own conscience dictates carries with it, as a corollary, the right not to contribute to forms of worship inconsistent with or in violation of one's own dictates of duty.

This principle it was which drew our forefathers to these shores, where they hedged themselves about in its maintenance with a hedge which became almost a prison wall, and which their sons have had to break down. The pillory, the gallows, and the stake have been the price of its assertion. But its fruits are the liberty we enjoy, and the prevailing demand for the complete separation of Church and State.

With generations of Quaker blood tingling in my veins, and with somewhat, I trust, of the spirit of the New Testament in my heart, I protest against being compelled to contribute to the support of any one of the religious creeds which I consider superstitious, corrupt, or perverted. I willingly contribute, in proportion to my means, to the support of two religious houses of worship in this city. But I am compelled to contribute to them all. An amount almost equal to the whole poll-tax of the State is raised for the churches. A large part of this amount is levied upon persons whose consciences do not approve of the purposes to which it is applied. It was different when this practice began as a part of the parish regulations of the colony, when nearly all believed alike. But see how it is, and is likely to become; meeting-house and church, cathedral and joss-house,—we must pay tribute to them all.

But, gentlemen, my time expires, and I have done. I cannot linger to recount the other considerations that might be presented; how exemption of certain property has a tendency to make the managers of churches and other institutions acquire, and hold unproductive, more property than is necessary for them, thus increasing uselessly the burdens of the community; how the exemption of some property necessitates high rates of taxation on other property, and causes high rents and dear means of living for the laboring classes; how history and experience teach that this course of things ultimately leads to the accumulation of the greater part of all property in the hands of the Church, and to general pauperism.

The segregation and perpetual increase of church and other corporate property has already taken on, in our new country, the symptoms and threatening dangers which we have seen so alarmingly developed in older countries.

Pauperism, bankruptcy, revolution, confiscation,—that is the natural succession of things.

Do one thing to avert these dangers. Fulfil the prophecy of our constitutional freedom. Let there be a complete separation of Church and State, so long boasted of our country. Make our State leader in this sure march of events.

Give us just and equal taxation, and carry out the same wisdom and sense of justice which seems to have sparkled for once upon the pages of our statute books (General Statutes, C. 30, Sect. 21), where, after certain provisions for collecting funds and taxes of religious societies, it is added: "And no citizen shall be liable (i. e., compelled) to pay a tax for the support of public worship, or other parish charges, to a society other than that of which he is a member."

[For THE INDEX.]

THEISM.

Under the title of "The Two Theisms," Professor F. W. Newman contributes to THE INDEX what the editor justly calls a "most instructive and beautiful essay." Mr. Newman, of course, claims for religion, as for science, a right to free thought, though, as he says, after the exercise of free thought we may easily remain far apart in our religious opinions and belief; for "to profess belief in God and to call ourselves theists does not go far in indicating real agreement." Do any two theists agree in their definitions of "God"?

Mr. Newman maintains there are "two broadly distinguished schools of thought, between which, if we remain theists, it is necessary to choose." There might, indeed, be a third school—the Deism of the eighteenth century; but this Mr. Newman believes has died out. These two schools are Greek theism and Hebrew theism; and Aristotle may be regarded as a representative of the former. Its cardinal point is that it supposes God to have nothing in him or of him but general Law; he is Force, acting everywhere according to Law, but under the guidance of Mind. He does not attend to details, and cannot have any love or care for individuals as such. To quote Aristotle: "It would be ridiculous for any one to say that he loves Jupiter." As no moral relations subsist, therefore, between us and him, all sin and wrong are committed either against ourselves or our fellow-creatures. As virtue exists only where there are temptations to be overcome, duties to fulfil, and passions to restrain, there cannot be any sense in ascribing moral virtue to God; and further, because of the want of moral contact between God and man, there cannot well be, on the part of man, any ground for offering worship or for the expression of gratitude.

The Hebrew theism teaches the universality of the divine spirit, and believes that to hold that God does not take cognizance of each individual only implies feebleness on his part. God not only searches the heart, but dwells there; and it is there that communion takes place between the soul of man and its God. Hence the Hebrew theist regards wrong-doing as sinning against God, and his religion thus aids his morality. He thinks of God as watching him, while the Greek theist cannot conceive of God either approving or disapproving our actions. The Hebrew theist loves God, and may truly and reasonably be said to do so. Greek theism is thus a science, a theory of the intellect; Hebrew theism is a life. The line which divides the two theisms may be drawn as between those who pray and those who do not pray.

The editor of THE INDEX remarks in a note that the "scientific theism we believe in is neither exclusively Greek nor exclusively Hebrew; but, while absorbing all the truth of each, embraces also truth not contained in either."

Indeed, it may be doubted whether it would be possible to find a real Greek theist or a real Hebrew theist. The latter would be, perhaps, the most difficult to find! Even when found, Mr. Newman implies he would not be much worth the finding! For "The ups and downs of a much-tempted, much-sinning man, often bitterly repenting, often jubilant with delight, may entail a mental malady, or may drive a man into hardened courses; I see the danger." There is no doubt the Hebrew theist revels in such passages from the Bible as this: "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." But the strong passions which called forth this and many kindred passages in the Psalms do not often spontaneously call forth such cries from men now; and unless such cries are spontaneous and voluntary, they are but mere mockings. What more humiliating sight than to hear such words from a pulpit, the occupant of which was carefully and calmly preparing his prayer in his quiet study, the previous day, for public rehearsal on the morrow! Is it not worse than humiliating to hear men and women, led by their ministers of religion, say Sunday after Sunday, "Have mercy on us, miserable sinners!" when it is a patent fact that not one in a thousand of those who use the words would own to the fact that he was a sinner (much less a miserable one!) if questioned five minutes beforehand as to his condition? More,—they would scorn and resent the insinuation. Yet these are Hebrew theists! There can be no doubt that Hebrew theism has an inherent tendency to hypocrisy, from the mere fact that wrong-doing is regarded as a sin, not only chiefly, but too often entirely, against God; while "God," being invisible and intangible, is no power to a weak-minded person (as pure Hebrew theists usually are) to keep him in the right.

Professor Newman evidently misunderstands the question, doubtless from the fact of his considering himself a pure Hebrew theist; though there can be no question he does not belong entirely to that school. He says: "A Greek theist may be an eminently good man, but no thanks to his religion; for when he encounters temptation, it adds no strength to him." On the contrary, I maintain his religion does add strength to him; for what is his religion? "Man stands erect in the presence of man, with whom alone he recognizes moral relations." Exactly; and these very moral obligations, which seem lacking to the Hebrew theist, are a real power to the Greek theist, and help him to overcome temptations to do not as he would be done by! It is precisely because he so highly regards human nature that he not only lives himself purely, but he lets others live too. To a pure Greek theist, who believes in an Unknown Cause, but who regards such Cause as outside the universe, with no interest save for the general welfare, there is perhaps lacking that sentiment of harmony with the Absolute Good which should be to a Hebrew theist his highest enjoyment and gratification. But, in the absence of a demonstrative proof that a God exists at all, and in the presence of many conflicting facts, supposing one does exist, we have no right to say of the Greek theist that his religion, in the face of temptation, adds no strength to him.

Many are the ways by which the existence of a God (which after all is but a name—our name—for the Unknown Cause) may be verified to ourselves individually; but there is no way by which we can prove it to a second person. If so, it is evident there cannot be a way by which it can be shown that God takes an interest in each individual! We may believe he does so in our own case; but in the last resort it must be admitted that we bring ourselves to believe this. Our thoughts are our own; for, though we admit Herbert Spencer's theory that the sense of the Indefinite is ever present to consciousness, yet the Indefinite cannot be formulated in thought. It is the definite alone of which we can really think, and about which we can think as we please. Our thoughts and experience are thus our own; and, brought up (I gladly admit, happily!) with the idea that God does see and care for each one of us, it is a comparatively easy matter to think of Him as doing so. If, however, reason demands of any of us that this theory be given up, there is no ground for arguing that, with that theory, all power of resisting temptation also leaves us! If the difference of the moral result in the respective schools be vast, I venture to think the balance is not against the Greek school!

Professor Newman says that "the Hebrew theist, if he live in the spirit of his religion, lives under the thought, 'Thou, God, seest me;' and it is harder to go wrong under the eye of a virtuous friend, though it were but a man. His religion is emotional, and adds a vital force to morality." But a man is far more likely to act uprightly under the eye of a man whom he can see than of a God whom he cannot see. The Greek theist is desirous his own heart should not condemn him (that being to him his highest tribunal), while the Hebrew theist has his supreme Judge at an immeasurable distance from him (in reality, though sometimes, I dare say, he acknowledges God's nearness; but then it is not felt), and the punishment which he expects from wrong-doing is distant and perhaps uncertain. And because his religion is emotional (the italics are Mr. Newman's), it is fitful, while the Greek theist acts according to principle.

If Greek theism has erred in ignoring the essentially mysterious side of human nature—that side to which the consciousness of the Unknown Cause presents itself, and which is thereby brought home to the individual soul—it has at least not erred on the side of presumption. It has not limited the Illimitable, nor has it clothed with personality nor ascribed human imperfections to That about which we can know nothing absolutely. It has vindicated the dignity of human nature, and has done what it could to save such nature from itself, when oppressed with the unwholesomeness arising from a too desponding view of its case. Hebrew theism, on the other hand, has bravely insisted upon the heart's claims to be recognized as in harmony with the Great Heart of all things; and, while serious fault must be found with it for endeavoring to bring down to human conceivability That which is beyond all conception, it at least deserves our warmest thanks for its earnest yearnings for communion with the God of Truth and Goodness.

May we not hope for a higher theism than either of these—an eclectic theism drawn from all the theisms of past ages?

FLORENCE.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE FREE CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY, OF FLORENCE, FOR THE YEAR ENDING APRIL 6, 1874.

When William Lloyd Garrison first realized the sin and curse of American slavery, and was moved to work for its overthrow, he, being of evangelical faith, sought the help of the Church, but found, to his astonishment, not only the pulpit barred against him, but leading religionists ready to defend the "sum of all villainies" as a divine institution, The first hall which opened its doors to this advocate of the poor and down-trodden was in the hands of infidels, so-called. Like the good, but infidel, Samaritan of old, these modern unbelievers came to the relief of those who had none to plead their cause, while the priests passed by on the other side. The Church having put itself in opposition, not only to anti-slavery, but also to other reforms, the friends of humanity were led to see the need of free pulpits or free platforms; for they found that the spirit of truth dwells with liberty. The anti-slavery conventions gave the utmost freedom of speech on their platforms. These conventions educated the people in the direction of free thought, and prepared the way for such an organization as the Free Congregational Society, of Florence. The founders of this society, believing that without freedom there can be no progress, built their platform on the basis of perfect liberty of thought and speech, giving the most cordial hospitality to the seekers after truth of whatever phase of belief. Expecting, of course, to hear doctrines which they could not approve, they provided that no one but the speaker should be responsible for what might be uttered, and reserved the right to criticise whatever might be said. By giving error fair play, they felt that they honored truth; because they who suppress the utterances of error virtually say that truth will not bear investigation. Our platform of principles has been so often published, and its successful working so long seen, it is strange any intelligent observer should misunderstand and misrepresent it. The Orthodox faith has been defended on our platform on a Sunday by one of its most eloquent preachers. We have had two other Orthodox ministers, one of whom, formerly the president of a college, and eminent not only for scholarship and eloquence but also for lofty fidelity to principle, has given three discourses from our desk. The Baptists have also been represented by one of their able ministers. A popular scientific lecturer, of the evangelical faith, has expounded science from the biblical stand-point. The Shakers have given their peculiar views by the mouths of several of their leading preachers. A Catholic clergyman has been invited to occupy the desk, and expressed his willingness to do so. The first resident minister of the society, Charles C. Burleigh, who held his office about fifteen years, is a believer in Christianity, in God, and in immortality, and is an eloquent defender of these beliefs.

As to the most noticeable work of the society during the past year, your committee would simply say, "Look around." Since our last annual meeting this beautiful temple has risen from its foundations. At a business meeting held September 23, 1873, it was decided, after careful deliberation, to call this new edifice "Cosmian Hall;" a name not only pleasing to the ear, but strikingly significant of the spirit and purposes of this society. The Ladies' Industrial Union began to occupy the lower rooms on the 4th of December last. On the 28th of the same month, the first Sunday meeting was held in the lower hall. The first fair and festival held in the building occurred on the last day of the year. Cosmian Hall was finished on the 24th, and dedicated on the 25th and 26th of last month.

In arranging for the dedication services, the committee knew they had no precedent to guide them, as Cosmian Hall was built on a plan and for purposes widely different from those of the churches. Our dedication must clearly be a unique affair. It should be a special jubilee for the society, and could be properly managed and used only by those in sympathy with the society. There would be present persons belonging to various religious denominations, and they would not come to hear their own doctrines defended, but to learn what this society was doing. Still, our invitations to speakers took a wide range, and, during the services, liberty was extended to any one in the hall to speak, if he or she chose to do so. Eleven speakers from abroad, and three from our own town, spoke from the platform; while six were represented by letters. The weather was propitious, the attendance large, and the meetings deeply interesting. As was to be expected, some of the remarks were misunderstood and misrepresented. As, for instance: Frederick Douglass said that he regretted there was not a portrait of Jesus on the walls, and as the hall was Cosmian he would like to see some of the domestic animals portrayed. Some one, we learn, reported Mr. Douglass as saying he would rather see an ox painted on the walls than the portrait of Jesus. So, when Mr. Morse, in order to show what crude notions of God the churches instilled into the minds of the young, related how, when a boy, he and some companions of his age proposed to test the existence of God, by calling upon him to send bears among them, it was reported in the papers that Mr. Morse had given the result of this juvenile folly as a proof that there is no God. The positions of Mr. Lilly were also misunderstood in various quarters. He was reported by the Springfield Republican as saying he "believed in no God," whereas the truth is he did not use that language, but affirmed the existence of a Power which he could not comprehend. And yet, if these speakers had spoken what they were reported to have said, they had the right to do so on that platform, as they alone were responsible for what they uttered. Even Paul, if living, might have expressed in our hall, as he did in his Epistle to the Romans, the wish that, under certain circumstances, he might be accursed, or damned. He would only speak for himself, not for the society.

As to how or to whom Cosmian Hall should be dedicated, the committee could not, of course, speak for all. Each member must, in a certain sense, dedicate it for himself. Mr. Connor probably came the nearest to that in which all the members could agree, when he dedicated it to the search after truth and the service of man. And, even if judged by the Bible, may not the society be said to have dedicated their hall to God, when they dedicated it to the service of man? For is not man, according to Scripture, "the temple of God"? If he is the "offspring of God," is he not the only temple in which God intelligently manifests himself? Besides, at the day of judgment, according to the New Testament, a certain class, who will claim to have prophesied and done many wonderful things in the name of the Lord, will receive the sentence, "Depart, ye cursed;" while others, who have dedicated themselves merely to the service of man, will be met with the welcome, "Come, ye blessed of my Father; inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto ME." The poet, George S. Burleigh, in his beautiful dedication ode, appropriately styled our hall "Temple Home;" for it does in a measure provide the privileges of a general home for the members of the society. These privileges will impose burdens for their support; and these burdens should be borne with the readiness that we pay the expenses of our own private homes.

Our meetings the past year have been well attended, and all the signs indicate growth. The society is under great obligations to the members of the choir, their leader, and the organist for contributing to our meetings the cheering and inspiring influences of good music.

The Ladies' Industrial Union continues to be an efficient helper of the society, and it is a source of gratification that they now have, for their regular gatherings and sociables, convenient and pleasant apartments in Cosmian Hall.

The Sunday-school has been ably conducted, and maintains its numbers and usefulness.

This society has taken a new and important step in the right direction by furnishing its hall with ample and beautiful arrangements for dramatic performances. A good moral work can be done by clearing the stage of its abuses, and devoting it to the elevation and happiness of man.

The term for which Mr. Connor has been engaged to serve the society, as resident speaker, will expire on the first day of August next. It is needless to say that he has from Sunday to Sunday brought to our platform the live, practical topics of the times, and given his ideas of them in a forcible and attractive style.

As Mr. Connor was engaged, and is to be paid, for the whole time, we have not been able to employ as many speakers from abroad as heretofore. We have, however, given a Sunday each to the following persons: Prof. Richards, E. C. Towne, Parker Pillsbury, C. D. B. Mills, Mrs. Elizabeth Powell Bond, Theodore D. Weld, D. W. Bond, and A. Bronson Alcott; and two Sundays to Charles C. Burleigh, who gave the first two discourses in Cosmian Hall, after the dedication; his first, entitled "The Unit of Universe," giving a masterly argument in proof of the existence of God; and the second, "Special Providences," affirming the universality and unchanging order of the divine beneficence. Your committee cannot close this report without tendering, in behalf of the society, their thanks for all the aid which has been rendered towards the building of Cosmian Hall; especially for the unostentatious, but munificent, liberality of that fast friend of the society and humanity everywhere, Samuel L. Hill. SETH HUNT, Chairman.

FLORENCE, April 6, 1874,

EXTRA-JUDICIAL VERDICT ON SPIRITUALISM.

HON GEORGE WOODRUFF, MARSHALL, MICHIGAN, JUDGE IN STATE CIRCUIT COURT:

Dear Sir,—Personally a stranger, I feel constrained by a sense of duty to address you, touching one of your official acts. As the actions and words of public men, in their official capacity, are open to comment and criticism, there is no breach of custom or propriety in my course. I find in the correspondence of the Detroit Post, from Marshall, a report of the trial and sentence in your court, at that place, of a Mr. Belcher and Mrs. Miller, for adultery. Of the sentence itself I have nothing to say. These persons are strangers to me, and, in pronouncing them guilty of a crime against the purity and safety of society, you but discharged an official duty. But in your address to them on that solemn occasion, I find the following extraordinary and extra-judicial language:—

"Something has appeared in the course of this trial, indicating that the insane orgies of Spiritualism have been mixed up with the cause and inducements of your crime; and it is not the first evidence afforded, during the recent session of this court, of the close connection between the demoniacal influence of the execrable tampering with that forbidden field of human inquiry, which has broken up the peace of families in the presumptuous search for a knowledge which begins by denying the truth of what is revealed, and by seeking the truth at the mouth of the father of lies."

I suppose you were elected to serve the people as a judge of law and equity, but not as a catechist of creeds or religious opinions. Do you thus lecture Methodists, Catholics, Universalists, or whoever may not agree with your theology? Suppose Methodists had been the culprits, would you have talked of their "seeking truth at the mouth of the father of lies," in Methodist meetings, or engaging in "insane orgies," where "demoniacal (Methodist) influences" were "mixed up with the cause and inducements" of their crime? If you had, a storm of righteous indignation would have burst upon you, from persons filled with regret for a criminal weakness which they never encouraged, and for which they were not responsible; and the cry would have been, "Let this judge keep to his official duties, and cease his lawless work of condemning religious opinions, or leave the bench he is not fit to fill."

It may be that you can say that the teachings of so-called "social freedom" wrought this mischief with these misguided culprits. If so, why not make your warning against those teachings, and not attack the opinions (religiously sacred to them) of a class of people, the great majority of whom have no unity with them? Spiritualism is a belief in the "real presence" of the departed. "Social freedom" is "of the earth earthy." If any professed Spiritualists use their views as a cloak for immoral theories and practices, they should meet the same fate which all good people, of whatever persuasion, hold just for hypocrites and pretenders.

If you had sought information, you could have found hundreds of protests against this miscalled "social freedom," from public meetings and leading persons among the Spiritualists, filling the pages of one of their journals which has wide circulation in this State as well as elsewhere; or you might have found these words of A. J. Davis, whose writings are widely read and held in high esteem among these people in this country, and are translated into foreign languages for European circulation:—

"What are the sacraments of true religion? First, personal cleanliness and chastity; second, a heart full of warm, devotional love to man and Deity; third, a head full of strong sense, steady wisdom; fourth, reverence for the marriage relation," etc., etc.

Why rest in such ignorance, and prostitute your judicial position by such reckless attacks? As a judge, it is not for you to decide whether Spiritualism be true or not, any more than baptism, or any form of faith or belief. You have no warrant or authority to pass judgment, either to approve or condemn; and when you usurp such authority, you endanger that liberty of conscience and that separation of Church and State which have wrought such benefit to the religious and spiritual life and thought of our country.

Are you aware who, and how many, your sweeping language condemns? I have known judges of our State courts who were Spiritualists—probably you have sat on the bench with such. I knew an eminent United States Senator, Jacob M. Howard, a man of great ability and high character, who tampered in "this forbidden field," and so became a Spiritualist.

Joshua R. Giddings was a brave, noble, and deeply religious man; but he, too, "sought truth at the mouth of the father of lies," as you would say. His daughter told me of his last years, his months of weary pain, and his triumphant and peaceful passover—a Spiritualist to the last! This illustrious list might be enlarged by names excellent and eminent on both sides of the ocean. For instance, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, of England—her wealth of poetic genius hardly equalled in our century, her learning profound, her culture the best, her womanly and motherly qualities the sweetest and highest,—entered this "forbidden field," and engaged in this "presumptuous search for a knowledge" only to be gained, as you say, by most base and deceptive means; but she lived in the belief of Spiritualism, and when she passed in peaceful sweetness to a higher life, not only England but other lands mourned her loss. In contrast with such wealth of manhood and womanhood, your extra-judicial verdict is poor indeed!

There are millions of Spiritualists in our own and other lands, scores of thousands in our own State, equal in character and capacity to the average standard, and with the common right of respect for their honest opinions. In your strange assertions touching Spiritualism, you take the unwarranted license of sitting on a judicial bench, viewing and condemning the religious opinions of others from your own benighted stand-point, and in a bigoted spirit; and thus going outside of all honorable usage or precedent in fairly conducted and dignified tribunals of justice. So it seems to me, and so I say in all frankness, as the public good (and your own as well) seems to demand. I trust and hope that your sober second thought may lead you up to a better spirit and practice, and that your judicial career may never again be perverted to such uses, or sullied by such words as these I have quoted. Frankly and faithfully yours,

GILES B. STEBBINS.

MINOR CHORDS.

BY MRS. D. H. CLARK.

Soft, ma belle, I am not at fault,
My memory plays me true to-day;
And a twelve-months' phantom bars the way.
A madness lived o'er! Yet I fain would halt.

I see, in the frame of a darkened year,
The picture that never can fret or fade.
A face—my own! (Did it fright you, dear?
Could you know who watched you the while you played?)

A sleeper—your lord! A player—his wife!
Gathering up from the soulful keys
Sheaves of the goldenest melodies
That ever ripened to passionate life.

A shudder of minors—flooding with grief
The palpitant air of a drawing-room—
Swept 'neath your hands ghost-white in the gloom—
Fugues of heart-break—an anguish brief—

And all was ended. Your face was set
Pale-sweet to the vow of Resolve new-born;
And the haunting wraith of a wild regret
Was laid—by the strength of your pure, proud scorn.

You came and stood by the jasmined door—
One deathless moment your silken train
Brushed me so close, that in wordless pain
I had well-nigh groaned! You turned once more,

Unknowing—and gave to the traitorous air
A name, low-breathed—shall I tell of whom?
My own! It was caught, in the voicéd gloom,
By the Angel Renunciation there.

GLIMPSES.

AT BALBEC, Indiana, another Liberal League has been formed under the name of the "West Grove Liberal League." President, Thomas Gray; Secretary, William Allen.

A NEW LIBERAL LEAGUE is reported by the Secretary as just organized in New Orleans "under the 'Demands' and 'Articles of Agreement' of THE INDEX." President, E. Worster; Secretary, J. E. Wallace.

WHAT DO you think of a bird with well-developed teeth? Professor Marsh has discovered one, and will introduce him to you with the sweet name of Odontornis. But this remarkable fowl has the misfortune to be a fossil.

REV. MR. DUDLEY, of Milwaukee, a very liberal Congregational minister, recently delivered a sermon on "Honesty" which seems very timely. Clergymen would command more respect from the outside world, if they chose such topics more frequently.

REV. A. B. BRADFORD, of Enon Valley, Pa., publishes in a local paper an interesting and lively résumé of the argument for believing that Lord Bacon wrote the so-called "Plays of Shakspeare." The case is well worked up, and deserves more consideration than it has yet received.

A MEETING of the Boston Liberal League will be held next Friday (to-morrow) evening, as elsewhere announced. The following list of officers was elected at the last meeting: President, F. E. Abbot; Vice-Presidents, Horace Seaver, Mrs. J. W. Smith; Recording Secretary, Miss J. P. Titcomb; Corresponding Secretary, G. A. Bacon; Treasurer, J. S. Rogers; Executive Committee, R. H. Ranney, H. B. Storer, H. S. Williams, M. T. Dole, Mrs. Etta Bullock, Miss S. I. Dudley, and the President and Secretaries ex officio. This League has about one hundred and seventy members.

IT IS SAID editorially in Nature for April 2 that Mrs. Mary Somerville's Mechanism of the Heavens "still ranks as the best exposition that we possess of Laplace's Mécanique Celeste." "No one," says the same writer, "could possibly have afforded a stronger refutation of the axiom, almost universally upheld half a century ago, that scientific acquirements of a high order are wholly incompatible with the proper exercise of the natural and ascribed functions of a woman's destiny." This is high praise from a disinterested quarter, and women may well be proud of their representative, even if she "was not an originator, but the readiest and aptest of students."

HERBERT SPENCER has fallen into a very strange blunder, which is exposed in Nature for April 2. He claimed that Sir Isaac Newton propounded the three laws of motion as axioms or à priori truths from which he deduced the whole Principia. On the contrary, this is what Sir Isaac wrote in a letter to Roger Cotes, referring to the word hypothesis: "In experimental philosophy, it is not to be taken in so large a sense as to include the first principles or axiomes which I call the laws of motion. These principles are deduced from phenomena and made general by induction, which is the highest evidence that a proposition can have in this philosophy." There can be no reply to this.

MODERN PHILOLOGISTS find whole histories in the languages of the past. Perhaps we should find similar revelations in the languages of distant people now existing. I have been amused with the following instances of expressive words. The poet-singers of Kabylie, in North Africa, have a special dialect or "argot" in which we find:—

A man, name of the leopard.
A woman, gazelle.
A child, little sparrow.
An Arab, one who understands nothing.
A Christian, a man with a hard heart.
Jews, those who are always enslaved.
Money, that which softens the heart.

E. D. C.

IN AN ARTICLE by Professor Newman in the Fortnightly Review, allusion is made to a remark quoted by Mr. James Parton in his paper on "Taxation of Church Property." Mr. Parton said that Rev. Dr. Vinton, on being questioned as to the cause of the greatly increased attendance at Trinity Church, frankly replied, "The blessing of God upon good music." This reply is attributed by Professor Newman to "a Catholic priest," and made to account partly for the rapid spread of Catholicism. In point of fact, Dr. Vinton was a staunch Episcopalian, and would have been horrified at being taken for a Catholic. Moreover, the growth of the Catholic Church is probably due to deeper causes than the influence of music. This is a powerful means of attracting a crowd of mere listeners; but it takes more than mere listeners to build up a church. Of course Professor Newman is perfectly well aware of this, and we refer to the subject only to correct a trifling error of fact.

REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, D.D., formerly minister of a Unitarian society in New York City, and now preaching as an Episcopalian, thus comments in the New York Evening Post on the religious tendencies of Boston: "As to the drift of ethical and theological opinion in Boston and Cambridge, the signs this last year have been in favor of positive principle and practical charity rather than speculative opinion and dogmatic exclusiveness. The pulpit of Appleton Chapel, Harvard University, has been open to the clergy of the neighborhood without distinction of sect. Old King's Chapel has heard sermons of a catholic spirit from theologians of various schools, among them two Congregationalists and three Episcopalians; whilst the Church of the Disciples (James Freeman Clarke) has had representatives of all Christendom, and even of come-outerism, to state their ideas of the Church Universal. Yet with extreme radical notions the regular Bostonian mind never has had sympathy, and appears of late to be more decidedly emphasizing its dissent. Perhaps the result is due in some measure to the extreme ground taken by THE INDEX, the radical paper recently removed to Boston from the West, and under the editorial charge of Francis E. Abbot, a man of undaunted earnestness and ability, with a staff of well-known and accomplished assistants. This journal assails what goes by the name of Christianity with much vigor, and is the organ of Free Religion in its most pronounced sense." The statement that the "regular Bostonian mind" withholds its sympathy from THE INDEX is truly alarming. To be sure, we do not know exactly what our courteous critic's "regular mind" is anywhere: is it a euphuism for Episcopacy? But perhaps no one ought to be astonished at deviations from it in this old hot-bed of heresies. Boston invented a nice phrase some years ago for what the vulgar call embezzlement, defalcation, and swindling; by a happy thought some "regular Bostonian mind" christened these things "financial irregularities." Will it not be the next invention in order to characterize vigorous thinking, bold speech, and common sense as "religious irregularities"? Whatever it may be, however, THE INDEX deplores the necessity of disturbing by erratic and extreme notions the even tenor of the "regular Bostonian mind," and with due contrition apologizes to the same for pricking its highly respectable gait into a dog-trot.

POPULAR EDUCATION IN ENGLAND.

The question of education—whether it shall be sectarian or secular, local or national, voluntary or compulsory—is the most important, if not the most exciting, question now agitating the public mind throughout the more civilized nations of the world. The report of Mr. Hawkins, republished in the last issue of THE INDEX, has condensed an immense amount of information respecting the American aspect of this subject; and we should be very glad to republish also the recent valuable work of Mr. John Morley (the highly accomplished editor of the Fortnightly Review), entitled the Struggle for National Education, as imparting a still greater amount of fresh information respecting the English aspect of it. But although it would be impossible for us to republish a book of nearly two hundred pages, we will try to give some idea of its contents,—not systematically, but selecting a few points only which appear especially noteworthy.

The great victory of the Liberal party in England, in 1868, meant chiefly opposition to sectarianism in education. "The party," says Mr. Morley, "as the parliamentary votes of its representatives in the House of Commons attest, was hostile to the extension of the denominational system. Liberalism in 1868 meant this hostility more than any one other thing. The assumption by the nation of duties which had hitherto been left to the clergy came foremost among the hopes of those who had been most ardent in the cause of parliamentary reform. . . . This was the centre of the party creed. The break-up which we shall see openly consummated in the course of the next few months [now no longer the burden of a prophetical prediction, but an accomplished fact] was practically effected by the men who came into office to resist denominational ascendency, and then passed a measure which gives to the schools of the Church of England about 73 per cent. of the total sum provided by the State for the primary instruction of children." [p. 16.]

It was the administration of Mr. Gladstone which, after disestablishing the Church of England in Ireland, handed over to her at home a three-fourths monopoly of English primary instruction by means of the Educational Act of 1870. No wonder that such a measure, bitterly disappointing the expectations raised by the Irish Disestablishment Act and the Irish Land Act, brought about the great revulsion of feeling which so astonished the outside world lately in the overthrow of the Gladstone ministry. It is worth while to glance at the educational standards it sets up.

Mr. Morley quotes from the last blue-book this sentence: "Considering the large number of children who leave school for work at ten years of age, it is not satisfactory to find that, of the scholars above that age who were examined, as many as 46,916 were presented in Standard I., 74,654 in Standard II., and 81,602 in Standard III." What are these "Standards"? There are six of them, as follows:—

STANDARD I.

Reading: Short paragraph from book used in school, not confined to words of one syllable.

Writing: Copy in manuscript character a line of print, and write from dictation a few common words.

Arithmetic: Simple addition and subtraction of numbers, of not more than four figures, and the multiplication table to 6 times 12.

STANDARD II.

Reading: Short paragraph from elementary reading book.

Writing: Sentence from some book slowly read once, and then dictated in single words.

Arithmetic: Substraction, multiplication, and short division.

STANDARD III.

Reading: Short paragraph from more advanced reading book.

Writing: Sentence slowly dictated once by a few words at a time, from the same book.

Arithmetic: Long division and compound rules (money).

STANDARD IV.

Reading: Few lines of poetry selected by inspector.

Writing: Sentence slowly dictated once by a few words at a time, from a reading book.

Arithmetic: Compound rules (common weights and measures).

STANDARD V.

Reading: Short ordinary paragraph in a newspaper or other modern narrative.

Writing: Short paragraph in newspaper, or ten lines of verse slowly dictated once by a few words at a time.

Arithmetic: Practice and bills of parcels.

STANDARD VI.

Reading: To read with fluency and expression.

Writing: Short theme or letter, or easy paraphrases.

Arithmetic: Proportion and fractions (vulgar and decimal).

Surely the steps are easy, and the summit not extravagantly high! Yet only 27.14 per cent. of the whole number of children in the schools are over ten years old, and 1.32 per cent. over fourteen years old; a large proportion of the children go out of school at ten, and learn no more; and of all the children over ten who were examined in the year ending August 31, 1872 (namely, 318,934), only 122,704 passed in all the subjects of even the three lower standards. The requirements of even Standard VI. are sufficiently moderate. Yet in this standard only 15,031 children were presented, and of these 1,236 failed in reading, 3,755 failed in writing, and 6,212 failed in arithmetic. That is to say, out of the two million children on the school registers, only 8,819 passed without failure in the three subjects of the sixth standard—in other words, were able to read, write, and cypher with even tolerable proficiency! Compare this astounding exhibit with what Mr. Mundella told the House of Commons in 1870, that the English sixth standard is below the lowest Saxon, Prussian, or Swiss standard even for country schools: "Arithmetic was taught in the schools in Germany to an extent far beyond that which was deemed necessary here. In Saxony, the pupils before leaving school were not only called upon to read fluently, and write a good readable hand, but they were also required to write from memory in their own words a short story which had been previously read to them; and the children besides were instructed in geography, singing, and the history of the fatherland, as well as in religion. We had never yet passed 20,000 in a population of 20,000,000 to the sixth standard in one year; whereas Old Prussia, without her recent aggrandizement, passed nearly 380,000 every year." [Speech in the House of Commons, March 18, 1870.]

There is a profound lesson in all these figures and facts, and we cannot better state it than in Mr. Morley's own words: "All this is the natural consequence of entrusting public money to persons whose chief interest in the matter is something quite apart from the purpose for which that money is entrusted to them. We are thinking of the nation, of giving a chance to the poor, of improving those intellectual resources on which, as a people of skilled trades, we depend for so much of our prosperity. The little knots of managers on whom we so irrationally devolve the duty are not thinking of this, but either of sect and its dogmas and shibboleths, or else of nothing at all." The amount of education actually imparted to the vast majority of English school-children is so insignificant that it fades away very soon, and becomes a thing of the past under the laborious conditions of their subsequent life. The public money is practically wasted, and the common people, thanks to the narrow sectarianism of their religious teachers, are left in dense ignorance of everything they cannot learn in the hard school of poverty itself. So much for "religious education!" Denominational schools are built and sustained for the sake of the denominations, not for the sake of the scholars; and if ever the United States are insane enough to permit what the Catholics are so loudly and persistently clamoring for, a division of the school funds, we too shall have to make by-and-by the same melancholy showing. Our own schools to-day stand sufficiently in need of improvement; but they are complete universities compared to what we should have under the denominational system, which makes both teacher and scholar, in Mr. Morley's dry phrase, "perfect themselves in religious thoughtfulness at the cost of arithmetical, grammatical, and geographical thoughtfulness."

So completely is the teacher in England under the thumb of the clergyman, that a vicar of the English Church could dare to say boldly in a public letter of a teacher who had offended him: "I, not he, am vicar of Dudley; I, not he, am chairman of the managers; and I will not allow him to insult me openly without letting him know that our relative positions are those of master and servant"! [p. 39.] The thrusts which Mr. Morley's rapier makes at such a clergy as this are so keen and penetrating that one would pity them, if he failed to do justice to the noble exceptions. "A little shiver of intellectual liberalism," he says [p. 61], "in some of the more courageous of the Anglican clergy should not blind us to the intensely obscurantist character of the rank and file. It is of no avail to point to the tiny handful of clergymen who accept liberal and modern ideas, from Dr. Thirlwall downwards. Such men, like Mr. Jowett and other academic liberals of his stamp, as well as the head masters of some of the public schools, are only clergymen by accident. They do not belong to the clerical profession. If any one wants to understand the real composition of the great clerical army, he should read the proceedings of the two houses of Convocation. It is here that we perceive the clerical mind in its nakedness—here or . . . . in such protestations as that of so comparatively modern and enlightened a person as Mr. Kingsley, that life will be worth very little to him, if there is to be any tampering with that priceless monument of wisdom and charity, the Athanasian Creed." And he adds, with an insight far superior to that of most of our own radicals: "The old-fashioned moderation of doctrine is changed into enthusiasm and excess, and our age of science is also the age of deepening superstition and reviving sacerdotalism."

Such is the party to which Liberal England, with the power all in its own hands, was led by Mr. Gladstone to betray the custody of the people's education. Such, also, will be the party to which America will betray it sooner or later, unless she carries out the secular principle to its ultimatum, the exclusion of all religious worship and instruction from the public schools. "We are teaching the religion of some with money raised by the taxation of all!" exclaims Mr. Morley. So are we in the United States, just so long as we hesitate to carry out to the full the Demands of Liberalism. The balance hitherto so nicely but so tremblingly preserved between sectarianism and secularism is approaching its end: one principle or the other must triumph completely at last. Which shall it be? Look at the picture here drawn of England's degradation, caused and perpetuated by sectarianism; and then—answer the question for yourself!

SUPERSTITION.

I have before me the Sixth Annual Report of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States of America. It contains an account of the means employed to secure the attendance of delegates to the Conference of last October, and to make sure of the success of that famous occasion. We are informed that during the year 1873 the preparations for the Conference absorbed most of the attention of the Executive Committee and the Secretaries. Letters of instruction, with free tickets for the ocean passage, were sent to all the foreign delegates who had previously accepted the invitation to attend and prepare papers on assigned topics. The Committee of Arrangements, with several sub-committees, went vigorously to work providing for the hospitable reception and entertainment of delegates. The Finance Committee, under able chairmanship, continued, with the aid of pastors in New York and Brooklyn, to collect funds to meet expenses. Public meetings were held in several churches of New York and elsewhere, the secular and religious press was enlisted, "and every other proper effort made to excite an interest in the community in the coming Conference." A confidential agency for Europe was employed to revive interest there, and hold the delegates to their purpose. Rev. Dr. John Hall, Hon. George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia, and the acting Honorary Secretary, Dr. Philip Schaff, were appointed for this work, which consumed a summer of arduous labor in Great Britain and on the Continent. "No pains were spared to extend and to deepen in Europe the interest in the approaching Conference, and the delegates were assured that thousands of praying hands would be lifted to heaven during its sessions, by noble Christian men and women unable to be present in body, but present in spirit." "The Finance Committee, with the cordial co-operation of many clergymen and churches, succeeded in obtaining what were deemed trustworthy subscriptions and promises for a little over the full amount it was proposed to raise ($20,000). But owing to the coming on of the 'panic' they were able to collect only $16,646." Nevertheless, "owing to the rigid economy of the Finance Committee, the gratuitous services of the Honorary Secretaries and others, the liberality of the transatlantic Steamship Companies, which spared us over five thousand dollars of the estimated cost of transportation," and the courage of the Messrs. Harper & Brothers, who undertook the publication of the proceedings at their own risk, there was a surplus in the treasury, after paying all expenses, of $9,379.44, which may be swelled to $10,000. The record, as even these few indications show, is a record of hard work, in many fields, by many men, and many churches, for many months; a record of generosity and perseverance, of shrewd calculation and patient persistency, crowned at last, as was natural they should be, with a satisfactory, not a triumphant, success.

Why, then, should the following sentence come at the conclusion of it?

"The Finance Committee have not submitted this sketch to show their foresight in estimating the expenses of the Great Conference, six months before its occurrence,—but, on the contrary, to suggest to all that He in whose service the Evangelical Alliance is laboring has overruled events in its favor, so as to give it success in the pecuniary means of usefulness as well as in other respects."

A poor compliment this to the Messrs. Harpers, and the transatlantic Steamship Companies, and the Honorary Secretaries, and the foreign branches of the Alliance who did their utmost to save cost to the general Committee! The Committee overestimate the expenses of the Conference, by several thousand dollars, and then call in a special Providence to account for the failure of the demands to reach their anticipations! Had they used no efforts and then moderately succeeded; or had they used moderate efforts and succeeded beyond their most audacious hopes; or had they labored hard and still been astonished at the prodigious result,—a modest ascription of praise, according to their creed, might have been overlooked, and set down to the account of sincere faith. But to have toiled terribly, to have exhausted every device, to have left unturned no stone that strength or skill could move, and then to have achieved a result which the observing world regarded as a partial failure, hardly justified the claim to supernatural interposition. Devout men speak reverently of God when some great good comes to them which they cannot account for. To speak of Him when the good is amply accounted for by human effort is to speak rather less than reverently; for it is to speak less than earnestly, or even sincerely. However we may define superstition, however much we may include in it, one characteristic of it will be generally recognized in a disposition to call in God unnecessarily, either on slight pretext or on no pretext at all. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 28th and 29th of May. The meeting will open with a session for business and addresses on Thursday evening, the 28th, at 7 3-4 o'clock, in Horticultural Hall (lower). At this session the following Amendments to the Constitution are to be acted upon:—

1. In the statement of the objects of the Association in the First Article, to change the phraseology so as to read thus: "Its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history."

2. To change the number of Directors, now limited by the Second Article to "six," so that the number shall be "not less than six nor more than ten."

On Friday, the 29th, there will be sessions for essays and addresses, forenoon and afternoon, in the upper Horticultural Hall, and a Social Festival in the evening at the new Parker Memorial Hall.

Interesting topics are to be discussed by able speakers,—of which further particulars will be given hereafter. WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary.

THE Christian Register suggests a new Free Religious Lexicon, something on this wise:—

ATHEIST: a rather Free Religionist, whose religious belief does not include the existence of any Supreme Being. A member of the Free Religious Association who abstains totally from prayer and praise. GOD: "the noblest work of man." FREE RELIGION: as great a success as "Protestantism is a failure." It has supplanted Episcopacy, besides annihilating the Methodists, permeating the Presbyterians, and submerging the Baptists. The popularity of The Religion of Humanity rivals that of Uncle Tom's Cabin, and American Religion outsells Little Women. CHURCH: a building to be "dedicated to man rather than God." CHRISTIANITY: a religion which prevailed considerably in Europe and America before the organization of the Free Religious Association. UNITARIANS: a small sect who are "not Protestants."

THE EVANGELICAL clergy of the Church of England do not seem to have heard, or, if they have heard, to appreciate the shrewdness and wit of Dr. John Ritchie's reply to one who disapproved of his going up and down the country and resorting to agitation. "Agitation!" said John; "what good in the world was ever done without agitation? We cannot make butter even without it!"

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE PRISON.

The "Mutual Improvement Association," which holds its meetings at the chapel of the Christian Unity, continued last Wednesday evening their discussion of the topics arising out of the disclosures of James Cotier and others, as to the management and discipline of the above institution.

The occasion was not very widely announced, but was well enough attended to show the great interest felt by those who had heard the statements made at the previous meeting.

Mr. Cotier was present, and stated a good many additional facts of interest, and answered with the utmost candor all questions put to him by the audience, and of all persons desirous of probing the matter to the bottom.

In the course of the evening an incident occurred which was important in its bearing upon the general credibility of James Cotier.

While questions were being asked about the "solitary cells" and the "lower arch," a young man in the audience arose and stated that he could give evidence in corroboration of what had been publicly stated with regard to the nature of the punishment in the latter place, having been himself confined there.

He gave a very nonchalant (and by no means self-exculpatory) account of himself, of the punishments he had endured, and of the reasons for them. But the important incident was this: James Cotier, who was unaware of the man's presence until he announced himself, recognized him as one who could give evidence, if he would, of his (Cotier's) non-complicity in the crime of which the latter has always declared his innocence, and for which he has been deprived of his liberty for several years.

Cotier rose from his seat, and, turning towards this new witness, asked distinctly whether he (Cotier) was or was not guilty of the crime for which he had been punished. The answer was a decided no. This answer cannot fail to increase the just and humane sympathy for James Cotier, so generally felt by all who have had fair opportunity of judging his conduct and character.

The discussion generally was interesting and well-sustained, and called forth many interesting facts and theories of penal systems. At a late hour resolutions were proposed calling for an inquiry by the proper authorities, and for the appointment of a committee to submit the same to his Excellency the Governor.

This, however, was voted down, not, it is believed, from any doubt of the general truth of the statements, but simply from an unwillingness on the part of many members of the association, who owe allegiance also to the Christian Unity Society, to appear prominently in any agitation for reform, as the formal presentation of such resolutions would necessarily involve.

This seems like extreme sensitiveness, if not a want of moral backbone; but we have faith to believe that men will be found whom no consideration will prevent from standing up for the right, the injured, and the oppressed, even if the objects of their sympathy are "convicted criminals." JUSTICE.

"SCIENTIFIC ETHICS."

LOCKPORT, N.Y., April 21, 1874.

DEAR INDEX:—

Your dissertation on the science of ethics I was much gratified to see. It touches a subject I have long reflected upon; and I truly believe that the discussion of morals as a science would, just at this present time, prove as beneficial to the readers of THE INDEX as any other subject that pertains to the freedom and development of mind. I believe, if the question were asked, "What is the difference between religion and morality?" perhaps not more than one-half of the people could tell. Things are so mixed up in the popular teachings of our Orthodox friends that very few persons have a clear perception of the fundamental principles upon which society actually exists, and to a knowledge of which it is destined ultimately to arrive,—a state of perfect harmony and peace, a state where all interests are mutual, all do their duty, and all receive their rights. But in all this such a wonderful field of research opens up before us that I feel an entire incompetency to attempt a discussion of the many principles involved.

I had the idea that morality was founded on the fact that men are finite,—consequently not capable individually of supplying all their wants, but dependent one upon another. Here is the origin of rights and duties. What is the right of one is the duty of another, and reciprocally. Moral obligation is an ideal bond that connects a right and a duty together, working through conscience. But I forbear; the subject soon becomes so complex, so many ideas are involved in it, that I will not write more. But I hope that some more able person will give his ideas upon the subject.

Your lecture was so compact,—so much was comprehended in so few words,—no doubt it may have seemed to some "dry and tedious;" but to me it was anything but that. If you will not think it impertinent, I would like to ask you one or two questions.

1. Do you believe that in the discussion of morals is involved the necessity of recognizing the existence of a Supreme Being? If so, where do you place him, scientifically considered?

2. Can a person have deep religious feelings, and live a very devoted, religious life, and at the same time be very immoral?

3. You close your lecture with these words: truth, virtue, love. What is truth? What is the difference between truth and knowledge?

I do not ask these questions in a captious spirit, by any means; but I ask for light and information, and it is possible that it will awaken much interest on this all-important and vital question.

ISAAC ALLEN.

[1. In our opinion the science of ethics is as independent of theology as any other science. Whether theism or atheism is true, moral relations exist all the same among men. But the relation between morality and religion requires at least a whole lecture to discuss intelligibly.

2. Catholic countries furnish many illustrations of a complete divorce between morality and religious feeling; and what is often considered to be the hypocrisy of criminals is probably only an illustration of the same thing. The brigands of Italy and Spain pray devoutly to the Virgin, and then go forth to murder innocent travellers.

3. We published in the first volume of THE INDEX a special essay on the question, "What is Truth?" Roughly defined, truth is the totality of all real relations, and knowledge is the understanding of them. Truth and knowledge are the objective and subjective aspects of the same thing.

It is very gratifying to find that some of our readers were not bored with our lecture on ethics.—ED.]

THE NEED OF FREE RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION.

The enemies of free thought have seized with avidity on the opinion of Strauss, in his last work, that we make ourselves ridiculous when we attempt to supplant existing churches by free religious organizations. Free speech through a free press is, he thinks, all we require at present. The time will come when "a fresh coördination of the ideal elements in the life of nations" will find legitimate expression in a new constructive organization to be developed out of the inevitable dissolution of the old religious societies. But the time is not yet ripe for this. At present, "mutual understanding without formal organization" ought to suffice.

Now this must not be allowed to pass without protest, especially as free thinkers are only too prone to the course here recommended. It is a notorious fact that free thinkers never seek to dissuade their wives or children from attending Christian places of worship, or imbibing popular religious theories. Doubtless their motives for this course are, in most instances, good, or, at least, specious. He who demands freedom for himself must yield it to others. Besides, some advanced thinkers recognize that it is only minds of a certain strength that are capable of receiving the free religious conception of the problem of the universe. As Strauss says, for the majority, churches, and the conception of the universe they present, are still a necessity. Others, again, in their profound conviction that truth will ultimately prevail, are content to stand by and watch it on its onward triumphal march, not deeming that they are at all called upon to help in clearing a path for it. Still others, from a delicacy of feeling that is no doubt amiable, act on the entreaty of the English Laureate:—

> "O thou that, after toil and storm,
> May'st seem to have reached a purer air,
> Whose faith has centre everywhere,
> Nor cares to fix itself to form;
>
> Leave then thy sister, when she prays,
> Her early heaven, her happy views,
> Nor thou with shadowy hints confuse
> A life that leads melodious days!"

But, however creditable or conscientious individuals may judge this policy to be, what is its result?

We cannot take up any book, pamphlet, newspaper, or sermon that treats of the present thoughts of men, without being confronted with the assertion (now becoming wearisome from its constant reiteration) that this is an age of deep-seated unrest, of profound dissatisfaction with ancient formulas and time-honored creeds, etc., etc. All this is, no doubt, profoundly true; but is it new? On the contrary, when was it ever otherwise? Infidels (we would prefer to say Free Religionists, but let "infidels" stand) may be more numerous in this than in any preceding age, although even this we are by no means sure of; but infidels there have been in every age. Nay, have there not been ages (in Christian history, of course, we mean) that were themselves infidel? How else shall we call the beginning of the eighteenth century in England? And yet in the next generation all this infidelity, whether of individuals or ages, passeth away "like the baseless fabric of a vision that leaves not a wrack behind." Free thinkers are sporadic. Here one and there another springeth up, somewhat, apparently, after the fashion of Melchizedek, "without father, without mother, without descent." This persistency of infidelity, spite of all discouragements, is no doubt a most powerful argument in favor of its truth, or at least of its having a truth. But why is it that it thus exhibits itself sporadically, and not in the shape of a continuous development? Just because Free Religionists, until now, have never organized.

And why do we not organize? It is to be feared that it is because we are selfish, and care not whether others share our views or not; because we are indolent, and will make no sacrifice or effort to spread them; because we are afraid of the censorious outcry of the Christian world over our "insidious" attempts "to undermine" its faith. But perish all such mean excuses! Let us take a lesson from Christians themselves. What consideration does the Christian show my feelings when he thrusts into my home, perhaps my face, a tract with the disgusting and insulting query, "Are you aware you are going to hell?" Let us also do "in Rome as the Romans do." Or if we disdain to treat with discourtesy those who are painfully insolent to us, as is no doubt the better course; if we hesitate even to disturb the faith of our contemporaries, which may be laudable and may not,—let us not, at least, shirk our plain and bounden duty to provide our children with such teaching as shall leave our sons, when they shall take our places, unfettered by the fear of disturbing their sisters' happy views, or confusing their melodious days, to speak boldly and freely, in all its fulness, the truth, as it may be revealed to them, concerning God, the universe, and man. And past experience shows that to do this a free press does not suffice, but must be implemented by organizations for mutual instruction, edification, and delight. O.

"POWER WITH GOD."

In the Independent of Jan. 1, 1874, appeared an article under the above caption by Samuel T. Spear, D.D., always a thoughtful and interesting writer, in which, from the Orthodox stand-point, the "prayer-gauge" discussion is continued.

As an explanation of the title of his article and an illustration of its doctrine, our author refers to the account of Jacob wrestling with the angel. The particular blessing for which, according to Dr. Spear, Jacob wrestled so pertinaciously was the divine protection against the wrath of his brother Esau. Turning to the narrative (a narrative, by the way, whose improbability is only exceeded by the marvellous fact that any one's faith should be strong enough to receive it against the protests of reason), we read in the previous chapter: "And the Lord said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers and thy kindred, and I will be with thee." As Jacob journeyed homeward, he became very much afraid of Esau's revenge. Did he solace himself by trusting in the promise, or calling on the name of the Lord? Not he. Taking counsel from his own heart, he sends his brother a costly present. That night, according to the story and our author's interpretation of it, Jacob was alone, when suddenly God appeared before him in the form of a man. Recognizing the Divine Being, Jacob seized his heavenly visitant, and began importunately demanding protection against his brother's revenge. God, now being unwilling to fulfil his promise, tried to run away, but Jacob held him fast until morning, and finally bullied the Almighty into granting his request. This story, thus interpreted, makes God assume three positions; now promising Jacob his protection, now struggling to break that promise, and now yielding to coercion. That any earnestness of prayer should cause God thus to vacillate is a theory certainly not calculated to exalt one's conceptions of the Deity.

A second illustration is taken from that portion of Scripture where we are told that Elijah prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and "it rained not on the earth, by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit." Accepting this account as literally true, Dr. Spear might here have rested his case; but to such as have not a faith strong enough to crush out the voice of reason, the conclusion fails, in consequence of the essential improbability, not to say impossibility, of the truth of the story. Were this account true, every living creature and every vegetable on the face of the earth must have perished. Had such destruction occurred —what?

In the concluding part of this passage is the following language: "We had better be enthusiasts and visionaries than absolute sceptics, reducing prayer to a mere exercise, with no results outside of ourselves." History tells of the work of religious visionaries and enthusiasts in the murder of forty thousand Huguenots at the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve, the butchery of three hundred and twenty-one thousand "heretics" by the Inquisition, the slaughter of five millions during the Crusades; and so on, through a long category that might be written in the crimson life-blood of the slain. Ah! far better the honest sceptics, the Voltaires, the Rousseaus, Renans, the Paines, Emersons, Frothinghams, etc., than the religious "enthusiasts" whose hands were reddened thus with human gore. To be a "visionary and enthusiast" is to surrender reason and conscience, which are the voice of God in the soul, and to follow with unquestioned submission either the chimeras of fancy or the dictates of a leader.

Farther on, our author becomes dogmatic. Hear him: "The God of reason and revelation is not an impassive, unsusceptible, inoperative, impersonal God, not a mere infinite but unconscious potency, not an unintelligent force. He is a person, as much so as a man, and holding relations to other persons, in which he makes himself the avenger of wrong and the awarder of those who diligently seek him." As to the God of reason, it is to be feared truth will not permit these broad, dogmatic statements, since reason has not yet risen to the height of comprehending the Incomprehensible, nor of measuring the Infinite. As to the God, or more properly god, of "revelation," he was unquestionably the personality the doctor claims him to have been. This "person" is represented as having been a tailor (Gen. iii., 21); a destroyer (vide history of the Noachian deluge); an unjust avenger, punishing Pharaoh because of Abraham's lie (Gen. xii., 17); a respecter of persons (witness his partiality for the Jews); a deceiver and an encourager of lies (I. Kings xxii., 21–23; II. Thess. ii., 12); an instigator of murder (Gen. xxii., 2). Thus the testimony of revelation is of no avail in proving the personality of God, since by proving too much it really proves nothing.

Conceding a personal God, we see nothing unphilosophical in the remainder of the article we are examining, in which prayer is claimed, under divine law, as an instituted force, a link in the chain of events which, if broken, cannot be followed by the consequence. Suppose yourself seated in a dark room, holding in your hand a lucifer match. You may have light or darkness; the former by striking the match, the latter by refraining from doing so. Here striking the match is a cause of which the illumination is the ultimate result. Now it may not be unphilosophical to assume that prayer is such a necessary cause productive of certain consequent effects; but the question, still unanswered, arises, Is this assumption true? Dr. Spear and Christianity say yes; but the former quotes the latter as his only authority and proof, and the latter vitiates its claims by ascribing to prayer a power which it certainly does not possess; namely, the power of securing anything which two persons may agree in desiring. (Matt. xviii., 19.)

What we want is proof that prayer has "power with God," not illustrations of how the doctrine may be true; such proofs as will stand the test of scientific investigation; proofs drawn from modern human experience, not from the myths and traditions of a bygone age. Give us the authenticated facts.

FRANKLIN WEST PARKE.

THE INALIENABLE RIGHT OF BELIEF.

On subjects whose truths can be brought within the sphere of positive demonstration, where realities are established beyond the shadow of doubt, we may define the extent of belief, and demand from all minds the same unvaried conceptions. In the investigation of certain subjects, we discover uniform, inflexible principles which invariably lead all sound minds to the same conclusions or ideas. When an individual entertains notions on these subjects in conflict with the axioms of reason recognized by all the ablest thinkers who have studied them, we may safely conclude that his ideas are erroneous, and the delusion of a weak or deranged intellect. Thus, if one should persist in maintaining views on the science of mathematics contrary to its simple and fundamental principles, we might, on the authority of unalterably fixed truths, condemn such views as false.

But when we pass from the sphere of the known to the unknown, when we leave the world of sense and matter and enter the unbounded realms of theory and conjecture, beyond the light of experience and the substance of earthly truths, the rigor with which we have required the ideas of others to conform to our own should be relaxed, and much greater latitude allowed for difference of opinion.

Concerning the future destiny of the soul, a subject which has engaged the profoundest thinkers of all ages, and one which the many and various religions of the present are endeavoring to expound, we all have a common right to think and believe according to the evidence which our individual intellects and peculiar educations enable us to grasp. The idea that all persons can have the same conceptions of God and immortality, considering the difference in their natural capacities of mind, and the diversity of the inevitable circumstances of their lives, is unworthy the reason of this enlightened age. How unnatural and absurd to expect and demand that others should believe precisely as we do on subjects of which we ourselves have no definite and permanent conceptions! And who of the most zealous adherents of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, who examines the foundation of his belief, has the same unshaken faith for even a day?

We all stand on the shores of this life and gaze eagerly into the dark, unexplored ocean of eternity; but from the faint glimmerings of light shed by the dim lamp of present knowledge on that mysterious realm of shadows, we perceive but indistinct and fitful images. One, whose faith is unbounded credulity in the teachings of his church and his cherished Bible, thinks he sees clearly the celestial city of the redeemed and the terrible and hopeless doom of the wicked, and with encouragement and warning proclaims his discovery to his anxious fellows; another, who cannot discern beyond the light of reason, who has been taught to found his belief on tangible evidence, sees only a chaos of doubts and uncertainties when he looks into the future.

It is very easy to dogmatize on man's eternal destiny, as the Church has always done; the interdiction of free thought, on the highest and most momentous questions concerning mortals, can be passed by the dominant religionists who presume to have infallible proof of the truth of their doctrines; but to define a creed that will satisfy all minds, and quiet the spirit of doubt, seems to be a task before which man's intellect must confess its weakness. In all ages of the world, the ablest minds have held different theories concerning the nature of that "undiscovered country" to which a vague or a clear faith teaches all men that this transient life leads; and it is dishonoring to humanity to conclude that the highest models of moral and intellectual excellence which mankind has produced have wilfully and obstinately sought darkness rather than light. If it were true that the human mind is so constituted that it naturally prefers error to truth, as some religions teach, why do scientists spend long lives of laborious study and research to settle one little controversy in some branch of philosophy, when a false theory would gratify this "depraved proneness to err" more than the effulgence of truth? Why do not mathematicians reject the ancient axioms of this infallible science, and construct a system of absurdities in accordance with man's inherent love of the false? How can this enmity to truth in the doctrine of man's future destiny be reconciled with the mind's constant and unyielding aversion to error in all of the questions pertaining to this life? Is not the position self-refuting?

The cause of so much discrepancy in religious views is certainly the doubtful data from which all theories concerning man's relation to God and the nature of his future existence are drawn. Though the evidence on these sublime subjects is sufficient for faith at times to triumph over death, and though the soul feel "secure in its eternal existence," yet the mind must often become involved in labyrinths of doubt, when it attempts to follow the longings for immortality into the inscrutable mysteries of the post mortem world.

I would not weaken the faith of the humblest believer who meekly accepts the doctrine of a future existence which he supposes Revelation teaches. This faith, though received from tradition and containing much of the superstition of past ignorance, is nevertheless sacred; and unless it could be supplanted by one of a purer order I would not breathe on it one whisper of doubt; but in behalf of those to whom nature and education have not given the same credulity, who find a tyranny in creeds, and cannot conform to the usages of established religions, I would solicit toleration from all who respect the dignity of human thought. What their loose and apparently dangerous views have cost them, others cannot know. How they have struggled against the incubus of doubt, endeavoring to rest faith on an indestructible foundation, and then dwell in calm expectation of surviving the decay of this mortal body and realizing the heart's grand ideals in an eternal existence, the simple votary of traditional religion cannot comprehend.

On a subject about which so little is definitely known, yet concerning which all are so vitally interested, great leniency toward seeming errors should be shown. The Orthodox, whose numbers and influence give them an assumption of infallibility, should not forget that the Christian religion has had different interpretations in different ages; that the doctrine which was believed by the Church a few years ago to be "the everlasting truth" is not taught by the pulpit or religious press now; and that views received as essential tenets of revealed religion to-day may be soon rejected as unworthy the progressive development of human knowledge. There is no truth more indisputably established by the history of religious development than that religion always takes its tone and tendency from the character of the times in which it is taught, and the knowledge of other subjects with which it is associated. Since religion is studied through the same faculties that are employed in the investigation of other sciences, our ideas of it must necessarily be modified by all the knowledge we may have derived from other sources. Hence no one can predict with any more certainty the religious views of the future than he can foretell the theories that will be entertained respecting geology, electricity, or any other natural science.

In consideration of these reflections, should not the shackles of religious creeds be removed from the inquiring mind, and free thought encouraged? We need all the light that can possibly be reflected on the science of faith; and who knows that there are not rich treasures of immortal truths all around our groping journey through the night of mortality which an unrestricted search might discover?

Let the conduct of all persons be subject to the closest scrutiny, and any departure from moral rectitude receive its just correction; but on subjects beyond the testimony of reason and comprehensible facts, let the right of honest conviction to each individual be inalienable.

INTOXICATION OF A NEW SORT.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., April 21, 1874.

DEAR SIR:—

In the Mercantile Library Reading Room here, there is a fine supply of English periodicals and papers, and amongst others stands preëminent one stout old conservative "Church and State," supported and known as John Bull. That this paper is strictly Orthodox cannot be questioned, for it would no more think of publishing a marriage in Lent than of doing the vilest journalistic deed which it would be possible to commit.

In the account of the services on Good Friday at various churches in London, I found that at All Saints, Margaret Street, a Good Friday Litany was said,—the church and people being in the most sombre costume:—

"Soul of Jesus, sanctify me!"

"Body of Jesus, save me!"

"Blood of Jesus, inebriate me!"

The effect of this, the account goes on to say, was the reverse of pleasant, especially in the case of the last lines, which grated painfully on the ear.

Their Holy Communion, as they call it, originating as it does from a cannibal feast modified into bread and wine, which has been again miraculously turned into the "Body and Blood of Christ," must be returning to its pristine simplicity, and will probably now be a Holy Orgy of Inebriation.

Of all the fantastic Litanies that any church can show, surely this one beats them all!

The Christians talk about Christ bearing their sins for them, and now, not content with that, they want his blood to inebriate them! Surely nonsense such as this, if ever equalled, has hardly been surpassed by any superstition in any age.

Yours truly, R. A. SKUES.

THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF THE U. S. A. CIRCULAR.

TO THE FRIENDS OF JUSTICE AND REFORM:—

Although the interests of mankind have been vastly promoted by modern civilization, yet our systems are imperfect, and perilous evils are growing up in our midst, which corrupt our common life, and menace the permanence of our institutions. This condition of public affairs has not only awakened the apprehensions of political seers and philosophers, but the enlightened friends and conservators of national liberty and national honor are everywhere oppressed with a sense of insecurity.

Now, therefore, be it known that to resist and roll back the tide of popular iniquity; to ensure equality in the possession and exercise of political rights and privileges, regardless of the distinctions of religion, color, and sex; to give expression to enlightened ideas, and moral convictions in social and political life; to rebuke demagogues by leaving them to find posts of usefulness in private stations; to indicate the claims of capable and honest men and women by electing only such to places of honor and public trust; to guarantee to all the advantage of education; to lighten the burdens of the poor; to prevent crime by removing the causes of injustice and violence, and by the reconstruction of our present penal code, and by substituting peaceful arbitration for armed invasion or defence.

With a sacred regard for the principles thus briefly stated, and for the purpose of infusing them into the political life of the State,—THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES, composed of both men and women, has been organized, and is now prepared to establish LOCAL LEAGUES in all parts of this country.

To secure your attention and coöperation, we issue this brief circular. Should the object of the NATIONAL LEAGUE commend itself to you sufficiently to cause you to desire to be identified with us for its speedy accomplishment, by addressing our secretary you can obtain details of our proposed methods.

WE ARE NOT sincere. We profess all horror at wickedness, but we seem to mean wickedness in general, not anything we have really done in particular and in person. It is sin we deplore, not sins. Our words of self-abasement must not be pressed nor misunderstood.

In the old legend it was no less than a cardinal that once went to confession.

"Oh, I am the very chief of sinners," he murmured in the ear of the priest.

"Too true, too true; God have mercy"—were the words that came back through the grating.

"Surely I have been guilty of every kind of wrong," he continued.

"Alas, my son, it is a solemn fact; have mercy upon him, O Lord."

Thinking that great enormities admitted would force at least a deprecation, he went on:—

"I have indulged in pride, malice, revenge, and ambition."

Then he sighed in mournful tones; and in tones as mournful the honest monk answered:—

"Yes, alas! some of this I had heard of before; the Lord have mercy."

The exasperated cardinal could stand it no longer.

"Why, you fool," he burst out sharply, "do you imagine I mean all this to the letter?"

"Alas, alas! the good Lord have mercy!" said the pitiful priest, "for it seems his Eminence is a hypocrite likewise!"—C. S. Robinson.

EVERY PRISONER should have the opportunity and be induced to earn something for himself, that may be put to his credit, and drawn when his term of service expires. If he has a family, he should be permitted and enabled to earn something for them, so as to keep alive his interest in actual social family life, and nurture benevolence. Moreover, he should be enabled to shorten his term of service by fidelity to duty, industry, and good behavior. The motive will elevate his manhood, and stimulate to effort, and both will add to his strength of character, and prevent that terrible indifference or despair which so commonly fastens upon prisoners, and works their ruin. In every possible way prisoners should be inspired to hope, courage, and efforts to be men, and this can only be done by employments, motives, and opportunities adapted to this result.—Baptist Union.

NOT IMPOSSIBLE.—The question was put some time since to a candidate for installation in ——, Conn., by an excellent brother, "Could not God have changed Pharaoh's heart?" The answer was shrewd but evasive. "I insist upon an unequivocal answer," cried the questioner; "Could not God have changed Pharaoh's heart?" After thinking a moment, the answer came: "If he had neglected everything else, and given his whole attention to it, I don't know but he might!"

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. JUST PUBLISHED.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

BUST OF

THEODORE PARKER,

BY

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dignity, reverence, sweetness, vigor, equipoise, breathe through the clay; the artist has so filled his own heart with appreciation of that noble life that he has been able cunningly to mould it into those delicate lines which the character had wrought on the living fibre. We are tempted to exclaim, as we stand beside it, as the old artist did to his perfected work, "Speak then!"—Hannah E. Stevenson.

All the characteristics of my husband are in the bust,—his greatness, his goodness, his tenderness, his love. You cannot give life to clay or marble; but you can represent it, and this Mr. Morse has done.—Lydia D. Parker to Hannah E. Stevenson.

The eyes, though but of clay, are gleaming with possible indignation, with possible tears; the lips are set firm with the resolution of him who, like Paul, could "fight a good fight" as well as "give a reason."—Samuel Longfellow.

The first time I have seen Theodore Parker since he died.—Wm. Sparrell.

The best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay.—Boston Daily Globe.

The face is strong and noble as it should be. The likeness is good.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Nothing appears for beauty alone, or finish, or to show the vanity of the artist. All is forgotten in the man—the true, real, Yankee man, Theodore Parker.—L. S. H. in the Golden Age.

Copies of this Bust, finely finished in plaster, $10 each. Boxing for transportation, $1 extra. Freight or expressage paid by party sending order. Weight of box about fifty pounds. Orders may be sent to

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the

Repeal of the Laws

whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

The edition was made as large as our funds would allow; but, so great has been the demand, it is already nearly exhausted.

Our next edition ought to be large enough to place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

To many of the subscribers of THE INDEX and others whose names have been furnished us as probable friends of the movement, copies of the Tract, together with Petitions asking the repeal of the Exemption Laws, have been sent,

With the Hope

that such friends will try to secure as many signatures to the petition as possible in their locality

We respectfully ask those who are unable to attend to the matter themselves to place the petitions in the hands of those who will.

Let us

ROLL UP THE LIST!

Let our united voices be heard! And let it be done NOW!

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to

Form a Liberal League,

we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——;

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

THE PRICE of Mr. Morse's bust of Charles Sumner is five dollars,—not three dollars, as we stated last week.

HERE IS a new Orthodox definition of salvation. Thomas K. Beecher says: "Salvation means health; so say our oldest and best translations of the New Testament."

DUTY ought not to be, as it is in many cases, a millstone grinding individuality to powder. Duty should be beauty; and, when it is not, it is questionable if it be duty at all.

THERE ARE ever so many people in the world, whom I should like to know; and some people I know, whom I wish I did not. This is a thought which sometimes occurs to one who mingles much with society.

THE MORAL Education Association will hold its annual meeting in Wesleyan Hall, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston, Thursday, May 28, at 10 A. M. Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Severance, Mrs. Woolson, Mr. Alcott, and others, are to make addresses.

EVERY new point of contact which a man makes with the world, every new relation which he establishes with society, becomes both a source of pain and pleasure to him. Yet both pain and pleasure go to make up our needful experience; and, so long as we live, our horizon line must lift and travel before us, albeit not all which is included therein is to our immediate liking.

IN A POEM on Death, by John Fraser, the following beautiful lines occur:—

"Then welcome, O fair Death,
Of all sweet things the breath!
Weary, alone, unblest,
My spirit yearns for rest,
And that immortal calm,
The only balm.
Let who may fear to die,
That do not I."

Is death "the only balm"? No; peace of mind, which one may have this side the grave, is also a sweet balm. And this comes through the optimism of faith.

THE Christian Union says: "The aim of a Christian life is to be like God." That is a better definition than we had expected from the Union; we should have supposed it would say that the aim of a Christian life is to be like Christ. But is it not a still better, because a more inclusive, statement to say that The aim of a true life is to conform to its highest Ideal?

A NEW POLITICAL movement has been started in Worcester, in this State, by a score or so of young men, "to gain a more thorough knowledge of the great questions of public policy which are to agitate our country during this and the next generation, and to introduce into politics a new element, with the hope that it may tend to elevate and purify them." The "elevate-and-purify" purpose is a most laudable one; but we wish our young friends had a less desperate case to apply it to, than "the politics" of our country presents.

SIR GARNET WOLSELEY is a man who loves a big shindy, and who prefers the red-hued honors of war to the green laurels of peace. The queen wished to "raise him" to a peerage, because he so thoroughly "licked" the King of Ashantee; but Sir Garnet wouldn't let her, inasmuch as he had "fixed his hopes and interests wholly in the military profession." If Sir Garnet continues to "fix his hopes" on the pleasant pastime of butchering people, his own turn may come one of these days, when, instead of being the slayer, he will be the slain. He had much better conclude to die a natural death than persist in rushing on to a sanguinary end.

A CONVENTION of the New-England Labor-Reform League will be held in Codman Hall, 176 Tremont Street, Boston, Sunday and Monday, May 24 and 25. There will be three sessions each day, commencing Sunday A. M. at 10:30 o'clock. Stephen Pearl Andrews, John Orvis, E. H. Heywood, and others, will speak. The League has less than "nine demands," but perhaps makes up in emphasis on its few what it lacks otherwise. "Abolition of property in land, of rent, usury, profits, and all other means whereby speculative thieves live on useful people,"—this is the explicit proposition with which the League comes before the public. We bid it welcome to warm and earnest work!

THE BOSTON Eight Hour League will hold its fifth Annual Convention, at Horticultural Hall, in this city, Tuesday, May 26,—with morning, afternoon, and evening sessions. The morning session will commence at 10 o'clock. Geo. E. McNeill, Esq., will preside, and remarks will be made by Ira Steward, F. A. Hinckley, Rev. Jesse H. Jones, E. M. Chamberlin, Rev. W. R. Alger, and others. The Hutchinson family will sing appropriate songs. The subjects which the League will consider are—The relation of less hours to less poverty; The more equitable distribution of wealth through the process of production; The relation of Finance and Christianity to the Labor Question. We trust the League may have a good Convention.

OUR CHRISTIAN friends are in the habit of claiming for Christianity all the credit of our modern civilization; but Rev. Dr. Kohler, Rabbi of the Sinai Congregation in Chicago, puts in a claim for Judaism, as follows:—

And what did the Jews accomplish for our modern civilization! They were the torch-bearers of science during the night of the Middle Ages. By translating Arabic and Hebrew books into Latin for emperors and prelates, they unlocked invaluable treasures for an ungrateful Christendom. At the feet of Jewish scholars, Germany's and Italy's great men sat to receive instruction from their wise lips. When Reuchlin and Luther fought their victorious battle against priestly arrogance and mental slavery, Hebrew scholarship was the handmaiden that sharpened their sword of truth, and put the heavy armor of learning on them. The great Reformation is much indebted to Jewish labor.

HERE is a specimen of eloquent Hibernian editorialism which we find in the Irish World:—

Away where the fiery Southern sun looks down upon the rushing streams and dense forests of Tasmania—where the Himalays soar to heaven, and the waters of the Ganges roll—where the pyramids, defying time, still cast their shadows on the land of the PHARAOHS—by the northern Steppes, on the shores of the Euxine, or where arise the minarets in the crescent-crowned city of the Sultan—there, imprinted in the soil, carved on the rock of time, distinct and ineffaceable, are traced the footsteps of the Irishman.

And this is only a tittle of what follows. Through nearly a whole column the wheres and theres gleam and flash, until one's eyes in reading are bewildered, so that when he gets through he scarcely can see any where, or tell if anybody be there or not.

MR. G. H. LEWES, in his preface to the abbreviated Life and Conversations of Dr. Samuel Johnson, by Mr. Main, speaks of those books which "every one is reading to-day, and no one will read to-morrow." There is much comfort in this remark to those whose time is so pressed by affairs that they have little leisure to read. To such it is very exasperating to be asked if they have read this or that last new book,—as if it were a great misfortune, or a literary sin, not to read each new book directly it appears from the press. The gods are sometimes kind when they seem most cruel; and if one is prevented by circumstances from reading many books, it is probably a wholesome restraint that he is subject to. Besides, as a rule, old books are the best,—like old wine. Whosoever reads the masters in literature will find that quality more than makes up for lack of quantity.

The Suppression of Vice.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, FEB. 15, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

My subject is the Suppression of Vice, as a principle in social reform. There is in New York a society for the suppression of vice. I am not intimately acquainted with its purposes, but, as I am informed, they are chiefly the suppression of the trade in immoral publications, an object at once legitimate and commendable; for the traffic in question is forbidden by law, and is, in every aspect, shameful and ruinous—a traffic in which no single decent feature is visible. With the organization and work of this particular society I am, however, not concerned at present; the name gives me my text and theme. The name declares a principle and a policy, that are at present widely discussed, and in many quarters loudly applauded: the principle, that vice is an evil to be forcibly kept down, exterminated, if possible; the policy, that to attempt this is wise and discreet. It is to a consideration of these points that I wish to call attention. Let me begin by avowing a warm moral sympathy with those who proclaim both the policy and the principle. Their earnestness, sincerity, elevation of purpose, all should heartily concede. They who wait and pray for a better social condition rejoice that at last the conscience of the community is aroused, and that a determined crusade is organized against the worst evils that infest and curse mankind. This strong warfare with swords and battle-cries shows a hopeful state of moral alarm, a healthiness of moral feeling, a sense of danger, and a faith in the power of good over evil, which are good omens for the future. Heaven forbid that any noble enthusiasm should be checked, or any promise of reform blighted! If the enthusiasm be noble, if the promise be fair, no serious check will be possible. Conscience is never wasted; moral feeling never fails to produce its due effect; earnestness carries its point in the end, under one form if not under another. A really good purpose is never thwarted by criticism or opposition.

Faith, at present, is strong in the power and duty to suppress vice. It is declared vehemently in the efforts making at home and abroad to shut up drinking shops by law. The argument of the prohibitionist is simple; it may be stated in a sentence. Society has a right to protect itself against destruction. The traffic in intoxicating drinks is pernicious to every interest in the community. It squanders money, wastes health, degrades character, annihilates will, destroys family peace, augments pauperism, increases crime, creates violence and brutality, poisons the fountains of life, and threatens to defeat the hope of republican institutions; for institutions, the very existence whereof is dependent on the virtue of citizens, must go down ignominiously if that virtue is corrupted. A society of inebriates will have a short future. It is, therefore, the plain duty of the friends of virtue, economy, intelligence, domestic peace, wholesome nurture of children, political responsibility and purity, to put a heavy foot upon the curse and stamp it out. They that appreciate the evil must arrest it; intoxication must be made impossible by stopping its cause. If the demand cannot be extinguished, cut off the supply; if the tempted cannot resist, abolish the tempter; annihilate temptation; dash the cup; shut the inviting door; break up the still by the hand of the law acting through the police. Let the strong fight the battles, as well as bear the burdens, of the weak. Let the good be conscience to the evil.

The new movement which is sweeping with such force through the Western towns is an expression of the same principle. It has peculiar features of its own. It enlists in the war the greatest sufferers by intemperance—women. It calls in the agency of religion; is, in fact, a species of religious revival. It addresses conscience, hoping to awaken a sense of sin. It uses the instrumentality of remonstrance, supplication, prayer, bringing the powers of this world and of the world to come to bear on the minds of the sinners; but the object is still suppression, and the ultimate instrument is force—force of intimidation, force of public sentiment, the threat of the hereafter, and, behind that, the force of law. From first to last the end is compulsion; to break up a traffic, to bring a species of iniquity to a summary end. The policeman stands in the shadow.

A similar spirit suggests similar projects to close fast all places of immoral resort. The policy of keeping such places under the watchful eye of the authorities, reducing their power of harm by severe restrictions, compelling them to submit to police regulation, is denounced as a virtual approval and patronage; and absolute suppression, in the name of public virtue, is insisted on as at once a moral duty and a social necessity. But there is no need of proving that the principle of suppression is at present in favor with earnest reformers. It is more to the purpose to examine the essential character of the principle itself.

And first, let us ask, What notion of vice is implied in it? Is it not something like this: that vice is a habit, a custom, a wilful abuse of good things, a perverse neglect or contempt of decent behavior, a deliberate defiance of moral opinion, a course of conduct, more or less persistent, which can at any moment be arrested and discontinued, a garment that can be put off, a custom that can be dropped? A scientific lecturer speaks of intemperance as an evil that is under our control. And reformers speak as if those who indulged in the vice did so because it gave them pleasure, and those who supplied the means of indulgence did so simply because it gave them profit; in a word, as if the vice had no deeper root than indolent thoughtlessness or a careless mood.

But is not such an idea of vice inadequate? No doubt, much of what we call vice is incidental and occasional; idle habit thoughtlessly contracted by contact with those that practise it. Often it is, maybe, a habit adopted recklessly, in full sight of ultimate consequences, which are, however, veiled by other consequences, pleasant and less remote. Much of what we call vice is wholly under control of the will, and can be desisted from the moment attention is fixed on it, or perversity ceases to hinder the action of reason. But all vice is not of this description. The larger portion of it is not; certainly the most pernicious is not. The word from which our English term is derived conveys the idea of taint, corruption, ingrained tendency to evil. It suggests, not such a spot on a garment as is caught from touching an unclean object, and may be removed by brush or sponge; but the spot, dyed in the wool, which no chemistry will eradicate; which renders necessary a new garment. The worst vices are of this character; the remains of inveterate habits, that have been practised for hundreds of years until they have acquired the force of instincts; have become propensities, a second nature, a kind of organic and constitutional fate, working in the blood, and passed along from father to child for many generations, striking down deep below the roots of will, and committing the person, in advance, to courses his judgment disapproves of. Viewed under this aspect, vice is a disease which no superficial treatment will remove. Such, as a great social evil, holding in its power the untrained, uneducated, unprivileged, is intemperance—a predisposition inherited from remote periods of huge animal indulgence, when people, unable to propel themselves by intellectual or moral effort, fed the fires of their energy in the readiest way, as the captains of the Mississippi steamboats used to pour turpentine on the wood to increase the vessels' speed. Cultivated people, who can put themselves in motion with ideas, need and employ no such expedients. The gales of heaven impel their well-ballasted barks. But the coarse and sensual always clutch at them as a swift way of bringing their working powers up even with their tasks; of beguiling their fatigue, diminishing their sense of care, or enhancing their animal pleasure. The use of stimulants of the fiercest kind is, among such people, unrebuked by any private compunctions or any public disapproval. It is accepted as a thing of course; is recommended, is regarded as indispensable to cheer and health. Every year, more and more are emancipated from the thraldom, by education and social elevation; but the number is still overwhelmingly great of the born and predestined victims to the law of inherited sensuality.

Every vicious propensity in human nature owes its origin to similar causes; all inordinate indulgence of passion has this history. The instinctive violence, the matter-of-course brutality, the furious impulsiveness and malignity, wholly unrestrained by personal or social considerations, the manias of all sorts, are the continuance of inveterate habits long after the occasions that called them into existence, and made them in a sense inevitable, have passed.

This is the fact the Church had in mind, and meant to state, in the doctrine of natural depravity. The Church affirmed a truth, though more absolutely than was just, when it declared that vice was an inherited and transmitted taint which no effort of the moral will, no exercise of moral purpose or determination, could eradicate, because it was deeper than all determinations of the will. There must be conversion to a new law; the establishment of a new inheritance; institution of a new order of qualities; in a word, a new nature. A new progenitor, Christ, must take the place of the old progenitor, Adam; and a fresh current of influence, creating a fresh law of habit, must predestinate people to blessedness, as the primeval law predestinated them to death. To this end, the Church discountenanced all endeavors through secondary agencies of education, culture, moral teaching, the natural affection and conscience. It had no faith in social reform, none in public legislation, none in political management; for these agencies only conveyed the impulse toward self-recovery of the natural man, and of course had no virtue to redeem the natural man. Who can lift himself by tugging at his own waistband? The reliance of the Church was wholly on the rites and doctrines of religion, the priesthood, the sacraments, private and home devotion, the training of character in an entirely new school—the school of Christ.

There was a deep philosophy in this intent and endeavor. Had the method been broader, and at the same time more generously and trustingly pursued, with force purely affirmative, and with sufficient of elasticity to meet the changing needs of the human mind, the results might have been good. Unhappily the method was stiff to inflexibility; it allowed of no modification, was susceptible of no adaptation to circumstances, and it was, moreover, fatally compromised by a stead yand angry resort to the method of suppression. A sif impatient at the slowness of the converting process, weary of the task of planting vice out, of choking the weeds of instinct with the flowers of grace, the Church undertook, with violent hand, to pull up the weeds by main force. Instead of abolishing the hydra by a beautiful law of evolution which should create a series of nobler growths, it undertook to cut off the poisonous heads one by one. It took boys and girls at the tenderest age out of the world, confined them in religious houses, refused them the joy of the flesh, and the joy of the eyes, and the pride of life, barred the gates to every terrestrial garden, mortified their desires, kept them occupied with prayers and contemplations, and so tried to starve nature to death.

Christianity, as was consistent, tried to repress also the disposition to unbelief which, in its opinion, was the most fruitful source of vice. The disposition to unbelief was regarded as the deadliest symptom of the natural, unconverted heart. To counteract it by an opposite disposition to belief was tedious and difficult, and the method of repression was resorted to. The civil power was enlisted in the work of exterminating pernicious error. Tribunals were created, laws were passed, judges and executioners were appointed, penalties were devised, heretical schools were broken up, heretical books were burned, heretical teachers were banished, silenced, incarcerated, consigned to the flames. Whole provinces were devastated, towns were destroyed, populations turned adrift to perish; the entire field of unorthodox thought was ploughed over and sown with salt.

And what was the result of the method, carried out on this vast scale, with full ecclesiastical and civil powers—the sacred and the secular authorities combining, the sympathy of the Christian world aiding, no public opinion opposing, the resources of wealth conspiring with the resources of fanaticism to make the policy of suppression effective? The issue is familiar to all who care to know the truth, from the reports of historians who have made it their business to ascertain and tell the facts. They certainly do not bear out the conclusion that the method of suppression is wise, or even practical. On the contrary, they suggest the opinion that it is as unpractical as it is unwise. The failure of the method was so disastrous that it quite defeated the ends of the opposite method of spiritual influence.

If we can believe one-half of the accounts we have of the state of monasteries, nunneries, convents, and religious houses of different sorts, whether in Italy, France, Spain, England, or Germany, we must come decidedly to the opinion that the law of nature, so far from being abolished, checked, or suspended even, held its own with all its original tenacity. Corruption, instead of being shut out, was made rank by being shut in; the vices of the cloister were no less pernicious than the vices of the world, and they were more shameful. The old chroniclers and satirists—Rossetti, Boccaccio, Rabelais, Chaucer—give by no means a flattering account of the sobriety, purity, sweetness, delicacy, abstemiousness, chastity, truthfulness of the people who subjected themselves or subjected others to the process of crushing out nature. The monstrous story cannot be told to modern audiences.

It fared no better with the attempt to exterminate unbelief, which was also regarded as a vice of nature. The Inquisition was active, the axe was busy, the fagots were always burning. Individual teachers of unbelief were put out of the way. The spirit of reform broke out a score of times before Luther, and each time was quenched, apparently, in blood. Arnold of Brescia, Jerome, Huss, Savonarola, were condemned and burned; the Albigenses were exterminated; the Vaudois were hunted down; the Lollards were scattered, and, to all seeming, obliterated. In Italy, Spain, Flanders, Austria, Bohemia, the system of suppression was worked hard and successfully. Even in England the destroying power did its utmost to make unbelief dangerous to property, reputation, and life itself. With what result? With no permanent result whatever, for mind was alive and refused to die. The thinker could be decapitated, burned, or otherwise silenced; thought could not be. The book could be destroyed; intelligence never. Intelligence spread by contagion; it communicated itself by invisible agencies; it worked from unseen centres; it was in the ground, in the air; the heel that stamped on its smouldering fire only raised a multitude of sparks that flew out in every direction, each touching a train that ran into the very heart of society. The tendency to doubt became a passion which hate and violence raised to fanaticism. When Luther appeared, instead of finding a barren field for his seed which had been burned over so many times that the sources of fertility were dried up, he found a rich, ripe soil, which responded to the first touch of the cultivator. The first spark he let fall set Germany in a blaze. More than all, the suppressed force of unbelief in the previous ages broke out with a fury that for a time carried all before it. The body of John Wycliffe, the English reformer, who had died peacefully in old age, was exhumed and burned, and the ashes thrown into the river Avon. Then an old poet expressed the conviction of the people, as well as a truth of Providence, in the ringing lines:—

"The Avon to the Severn runs,
The Severn to the sea;
And Wycliffe's dust shall spread abroad
Wide as her waters be."

If one thing is demonstrated, it is this: The attempt to suppress nature, under any form, so it be nature that is suppressed, is futile. The old proverbs which say, "Drive nature out at the door and she comes in at the window;" "you cannot expel nature with a fork," hold a truth that is for all time. Incidental habits may be modified or corrected; superficial evils may be checked; mischiefs that owe their existence to circumstances may be eradicated by altering circumstances; vices that have root no deeper than chance association may be eradicated by breaking up the association; but deeply-rooted propensities, habits which have become a second nature, cannot be thus dealt with. No Hercules' club will avail to kill the vital principle that grows venomous heads faster than they can be bruised.

The effort to suppress nature by violent measures is always followed by, always produces, a reaction, that is exactly proportioned in strength to the effort, and fully balances it. Healthy progress is measured, gradual and slow, according to sure conditions of cause and effect. It consists of a long line of close sequences knit together, not mechanically, like a chain, but organically, like a muscle or a nerve. Every inch of growth implies a preceding inch of growth; there is no such thing as jump or leap from point to point. You do not make the elastic band longer by stretching it, you but loosen the cohesion of its parts; the strain being relaxed, the band resumes its first condition; the strain being continued, the band loses its elasticity, and breaks. There is no more power than there is. The athletic rowers in the regatta, putting the full measure of their strength into their stroke, and finding themselves dropping behind, think, by a sudden "spurt," to recover their loss; but the excessive strain is felt in the diminished vigor of the subsequent strokes. Every forced revival of religion shows this in a manner that ought to satisfy any rational person; the revulsions from overstrained social reform show it conclusively. Society is not furthered by such expedients; it seems to be put back—it is not pushed forward. Even Father Mathew's temperance crusade, one of the wholesomest, simplest, most reasonable in method ever undertaken, is in point. "Two millions and a half of gay or brutal drunkards were turned into a corps of the most thoughtful and emotional men in Ireland." But the same author who records that fact records also the fact that "the temperance movement of Father Mathew was reduced, by the means employed to inspire it, from a secure moral reform to a temporary enthusiasm." "The sower grievously erred in consigning some of his seed to soil where it could not take root, but must wither away." The rate of speed was suddenly increased to a promising degree, but to increase it the engines were overworked, and the subsequent advance was at a less rate than before.

Nature will have her way—if not by one channel then by another. She will plunge underground and come up in unexpected spots. Cunning comes to her assistance; she makes alliance with subterfuge and deceit. She is sly, swift, ubiquitous. Disappearing in New York, she turns up in Philadelphia. Expelled from the cities, she takes refuge in the towns; banished from the towns, she finds coverts in the cities, hiding in the dens and slums, creeping into the lanes, mingling with the crowd of harmless things, sheltering herself behind law, covering herself with garments of fashion. She is a Proteus, able to take on every possible shape of innocence. Refuse her brandy, she will take opium, morphine, ether, tobacco, strong coffee, in quantities equivalent to the stimulus denied. You fancy the community becoming temperate in one respect, and find it becoming intemperate in another. Opium-eaters multiply as dram-drinkers decrease. The vicious propensity is alive still, and perhaps provoked to activity by the efforts made to repress it; the natural appetite being reinforced by anger, spite, the spirit of resistance to persecution, which grows dogged and stubborn, fortifying the sense of injustice by the pride of self-will.

The policy of suppressing vice thus becomes exceedingly questionable. The perils of it are manifold, and often so subtle as to be unseen and incalculable. Even when the vice is frightful in character and extent, its ravages terrific, its harm openly apparent and confessed by all, the experiment of suppression is to be tried only after much consideration and misgiving, and with extreme caution. It would seem as if there could be no clearer case than that presented by houses of evil resort. The existence of such places is such an outrage on decency, such an affront to manhood and womanhood, such a source of disease and death and misery inestimable, to the community, that virtue feels justified in resorting to the sharpest, sternest, most summary means of abolishing them entirely. But pause, says the thoughtful reformer. Consider whether you may not drive the evil you deplore more deeply in. If the vice that erects and fills these places be, as there is good reason to think it is, one of those transmitted taints in the blood which strike into the texture of the system—if the habit be inveterate, the instinct exorbitant, the appetite greatly in excess of need,—then the remedy you propose will be worse than the disease. You may discover the corruption in places where hitherto it has never been seen—in the sheltered and privileged places of society, in your own carefully-guarded circle, possibly in your own homes. Can you be certain that this horrid plague-sore that is open in modern society—it was more offensive in ancient—may not, after all, be an outlet of deliverance from pent-up moral and physical disorder, and that these wretched and abhorred women, whom it is loathing even to name, may not be the unconscious and unwilling saviors of society, and not merely society's shame and curse? Should this, or anything like it, be true, the policy of suppression, even in this case, would prove to be fatally disastrous to the gravest interests.

Do we take the ground, then, that vice is not to be kept under? made subordinate and submissive to virtue? reduced in power and dimensions to the lowest possible point? No, no, a thousand times. On the contrary, this is the thing we most cordially desire—none more so. But the system of repression we believe to be the most unlikely to secure it. Not suppression of the worse by direct attack, but conquest of the worst by the cultivation of the better, would seem to be the correct principle.

We would restore discipline to its just place in the development of man and of society; in the training of the person, the order of domestic life, the conduct of social reforms. Discipline—the first meaning whereof is teaching; the last meaning, control. The method of discipline is in every case the method of culture; of training in positive qualities. The discipline of individual character consists in steady application of the mind to worthy subjects; in study of serious things; in education of the taste for intellectual pursuits. The discipline of children consists in the engagement of their thoughts in matters outside of their own pleasure. There need be no severity in it, of any sort; no punishment or menace of punishment; no scolding or rebuke. All may be as sweet as it is wise. The child may be gently drawn away from foolish and wasteful gratifications, to amusements, entertainments, recreations, studies, that are delightful as well as profitable, and may come gradually but surely into the possession of wholesome tastes, true affections, a balanced will, a clear moral sense, an awakened reason, without being made aware that any urging process was practised. In such cases vicious tendencies are simply anticipated, prevented, hedged off, as it were. Their objects are taken away; their outlet is turned aside. No appetite has been repressed, no passion has been condemned, no desire has been crucified, no instinct has been rudely cramped. The animal part of the nature has been distanced—that is all—by the intellectual part, and lends its force to intellectual pursuits. The fires in the hold of the vessel propel it instead of destroying it. The propensities are all there; but something else is there, too, directing, controlling, employing them usefully. "The true beginning of this is the desire of discipline; and the care of discipline is love; and love is the keeping of wisdom's laws; and the giving heed to those laws is the assurance of incorruption."

A great deal of needless commiseration has been thrown away on the late John Stuart Mill—the tale of whose much-disciplined boyhood has been read with such general interest. But, austere in method as his father was, patient, unremitting, and close as was the training, it does not appear that the principle of repression had any part in it. No impulse was cut off, no taste sacrificed, no cardinal desire crucified. The knife was applied to no part of the mental or moral nature. The discipline consisted in training the boy in love and enthusiasm for intellectual pursuits, in the even, firm, compact building up of the reason. That the lad suffered from attempts to compress, stunt, dwarf, or cripple his constitution, there is no evidence. All the juices of the nature were preserved. There was no excess of them. They would not, under any circumstances, have risen high and overflowed; but they communicated a gentle warmth to the nobly-educated reason that was felt by all who came within its reach. Such vicious tendency as was in the lad (and he, like all the rest of mankind, must have had his vicious tendency) was either diverted or made to turn another machine.

The name "Puritan" is associated in most minds with the system of suppression; but the association is, in large measure, a mistaken one. If the Puritan discipline involved repression, it involved a great deal besides. At bottom, it was training in mental and moral virtue. Such repression as there was, was rather incidental than cardinal; circumstances, more than principle, suggested it. The Puritan never dreamed of driving out nature with a fork. His faith was in the ability to create a steadfast, noble nature, by faithful use of the means at his command. These means—the only means he had—were religious reading of the inspired Word, which nobody doubted; listening to sermons from men whom all revered; teaching the feet to walk in narrow ways which, all were sure, led to heaven; filial duty and obedience; the habitual practice of sobriety in all respects. This was not painful, as it seems to us it must have been; there was no such compulsion required as would be required now to make young people do the same thing. The beautiful, inspiring aspect of the discipline was turned outward; the paths of spiritual wisdom were, at least in the immense majority of instances, paths of pleasantness and peace. And the result was not often, or in the main, a pinched, angular, peaked, dry-hearted, sour-visaged character—a sapless mind and a soul of vinegar; it was a manly, robust, determined, earnest creature, full of purpose, fearless, just, inflexible, but also tender and true; with a force of passion at times terrible, at times gracious as loving-kindness itself. Finer specimens of men and women than the best of them were, it would be difficult, anywhere in the range of human experience, to find. The best of them were as perfect samples of men and women as that age could produce. They were the sifted wheat of humanity.

Now, in planning a successful warfare against vice in a community, considerations like these must be entertained. The tempting method of suppression, so obvious, so easy, so gratifying to the belligerent conscience, so pleasing to the pharisaic heart, so flattering to self-righteousness, so captivating to the lovers of excitement, so self-evident to the believers in law and government, must be abandoned for the harder, less alluring, less tumultuous method of discipline, the slow but certain method of training; vice must be outwitted and left behind.

In this matter three things are to be kept in mind:

1. Passion must have its satisfaction, impulse must be allowed to flow, appetite must be fed. If one mode of indulgence is taken away, another must be provided. If alcohol is refused, coffee or some good substitute must be furnished. Because some toys are dangerous, all toys should not be proscribed; because some amusements are harmful, all amusement need not be denounced; because some laughter is created by coarse ribaldry, it is unreasonable to say that all laughter is mad. Have we studied sufficiently the resources of innocent pleasure? Is there not a disposition, in the foes of malignant indulgence, to frown equally on all indulgences, putting them all in one category, and overlooking the proportions of mischief and the shades of turpitude in them? Is it not too often and too much the case, that the enemy of alcohol is an enemy also of tobacco, and coffee, and every species of stimulant? But though all may be injurious, some are less injurious than others; and to replace the more harmful by the less harmful, till gradually the least harmful are practised, and at last all are forsaken, would appear to be the plan of wisdom. Already the institution of good coffee-houses has had an effect on the patronage of gin-shops; multiply them, and the effect will be increased; add to the variety and strength of their attractions, and the effect will be augmented still more. The vicious tendency will be gently led into other channels till the old channels become dry. This will cost labor, both in devising schemes and executing them; labor unremunerated by money, or notoriety, the results whereof make no display; but it is the labor that counteracts evil. Prayer is put into it, but no human ear hears it; consecration is put into it, but it makes no noise; faith and hope and charity are put into it, but the evidence of them is the force of good they exert.

2. Some diversion must be hit on for leisure hours. Leisure hours are hours of temptation. The vicious propensity is content with the idle moments. To put an end to its monopoly of them, other engagements must be invented and introduced; out-door sports, in-door games. The continental people owe their temperance and continence, not to temperament alone, but quite as much to their gardens, their open-air concerts, their galleries and places of general resort. With these helps, a moderate stimulus goes a great way. The hour is agreeably occupied, the perilous reefs are tided over, and the result of leisure, instead of weakness, is strength. These continental customs should be encouraged, and not, as now, discouraged by the friends of orderly social development. Though not unobjectionable in some of their features, as methods of employing leisure time, whether on week-days or on Sundays, they are vastly less objectionable than the methods employed by the illiterate and passionate among ourselves. We should be grateful that a large and influential class of our citizens have the art of enjoying their leisure in comparative harmlessness; and, instead of discountenancing and persecuting them, should wish that others would take example from them.

3. Finally, nothing can be done in this great warfare with evil without the cultivation of moral feeling. I do not say religious, because that word suggests the machinery of revivals, church-going, sermons, prayers, the fanatical and superstitious use of the most delicate instruments. By moral feeling I mean the feeling of personal responsibility to society. The feeling of duty, respect, consideration; the feeling of shame, of ambition; of interest in the welfare of those more or less intimately associated in vital bonds; of concern for the health, happiness, and improvement of fellow-creatures. To awaken these feelings in dull hearts, to stimulate them in callous ones, to create them perhaps in lifeless ones, is the task of tasks. But till this is attempted all beside will be precarious, for on the faithful discharge of it depends the grand moral lift—the movement of the tidal wave that carries the vessel over all bars and reefs, and floats her in the open sea. To awaken this, more serviceable methods than are now used must be employed. Religion must put on its simplest garb, and go about among men as a spirit of earnest humanity. All warm and cordial literature must be welcomed. Social reform must be commended by the reformer's sweetness. The beauty of holiness must be illustrated as its austerity has been hitherto. The efforts of teachers, preachers, lecturers, must be directed to the education more than to the entertainment of men and women. And above and beyond all, for the spectral faith in Christ must be substituted a faith in man, hearty, hopeful, glowing, winning, which takes people at their best, believeth all things, endureth all things. And a faith like this will be possible only when the old religion shall have passed away, or when the new religion shall have acquired strength to make its ideas prevail.

THE "MYSTERY OF MATTER."*

BY W. C. GANNETT.

As the new vision of Nature is dawning on our minds, a new faith is slowly kindling in men's hearts; but as yet there is little of the prophet's sureness, the poet's joy, in it. In reading the famous Essays and Reviews, years ago, one of the things which gave surprise, as coming from seers with eyes more widely opened than their neighbors, was the under-wail that rose here and there about the future of religion. With all their boldness, one and another spoke forlornly as men who foresaw eclipse. Picton is a different man. In him the happy hymns of the new faith have begun to sing themselves. He grapples directly with the question, What becomes of religion under to-day's science? Does the universe that is changing aspect so fast before our eyes insure its permanence? He virtually asks the two conundrums of Strauss' book, only reversing their order,—Have we a religion? Have we a Christianity? And he answers yes to both; but the answer is,—We have a Christian pantheism. For intellectual men, he thinks, there is no future to religion otherwise; but in this form it is sure, and never was form so true and grand. To two classes of THE INDEX readers, therefore, we heartily recommend the book,—to those who fear lest science is undermining all religion; and to those, if any such there be, who are sure it has done so already, and are glad.

His title helps to place the author for us,—"the mystery of matter." Then he is not a "materialist." But "the mystery of matter,"—then possibly he is not to be scared by a "mechanical equivalent of consciousness." Not he! and he holds Huxley to be "perhaps the most completely armed opponent that materialism has ever had; for he has shown, with a force amounting to demonstration, that by whatever path we set out, whether that of materialism or that of idealism, if we only go far enough, we are brought to the same point."

Besides Huxley, other men, speaking like him from the stand-point of science, have of late been suggesting the same thing,—that "matter" and "mind" are not two separate entities, but one; and this, not in the sense that either "matter" is the one, or that "mind" is the one, as different parties urge; but that, as Tyndall words it, "They are two opposite faces of the self-same mystery:" as Bain puts it, "A double-faced unity, one substance with two sets of properties, with which we are to deal, as in the language of the Athanasian Creed, not confounding the persons nor dividing the substance." This thought, and the conception of the universe founded thereon, gives Picton the theme for the first two of his five essays—those called the "Mystery of Matter" and the "Philosophy of Ignorance." He thinks that it is the perceptible current of the popular mind towards this acceptance of a uni-verse that causes all of to-day's trouble in "the private mill-dams and side-channels of theological vested interests," and that the only escape from the dreaded materialism is through the materialism into the presence of this two-faced eternal unity that passes understanding.

The argument, divested of all its eloquence, runs thus:—

Sensation involves two factors, the perceiving subject, the perceived object; and we have no right to invest either factor separately with the whole value of the two brought into conjunction. Self-existence is the primal recognition involved in the consciousness of every experience; but what do we know of that beyond ourselves which causes the experience? Sensation itself tells us nothing about the nature of its cause. Neither does science; for the explanation of science, ending in the mechanics of atoms, does not conceivably account for the known effect. Extend the train of molecular machinery from the mazy dance which science sees in the sunset clouds, through ether, lenses, retina, optic nerve, into the brain-lobes—and it does so far extend,—still something happens utterly incommensurate with all this—the joy and the imaginings that rise in us as we watch the sunset. So granting, as we do, that the two factors are inextricably united, granting that "thought is as much a function of matter as motion is," we have to give a new meaning to "matter."

Examine "matter" then. These vibrating molecules may turn out something different from what they seem. If impenetrability, exclusive occupation of space, is its essential quality, "matter" must be either continuous—i.e., infinitely divisible or atomic,—with void spaces between the atoms. The first theory would render all changes or differences in density impossible, and so becomes absurd. The second would make it possible for "force" to exist in the inter-atomic voids where no matter is; but this, if possible anywhere, may be possible everywhere, and we may resolve the atoms altogether into immaterial force-centres—so that this theory also explodes itself, and "matter" cannot be the simple thing it seemed. A mysterious something remains, known as physical force without, as conscious life within, to fascinate with hints of a unity involving in itself the energy both of self and of the not-self. "Materialism" professes that all can be finally explained on mechanical principles. The "philosophy of ignorance" believes that all may be expressed in terms of mechanics, but confesses the fundamental mystery of the universal life.

Consider this so-called "matter" again, in relation to the so-called "mind" or "spirit." Only four theories here are possible. Either (1) they are two independent substances,—in which case both must be eternal, for, if one creates the other, that really violates the supposition; but "no one now would pretend to believe" in two eternal substances mutually exclusive,—or (2) "matter" is the sole real substance, and "mind" is its phenomenon,—the only theory which is absolute materialism. But besides the fact just shown that "matter," as such, disappears from conception under analysis, it disappears also in virtue of the relativity of all our knowledge. It is only known to us at all in forms of mental consciousness, yet it is this consciousness which we, inverting our ignorance, are to invite ourselves to call its phenomenon! or (3) "mind" is the sole real substance, and it manifests itself in "matter." This it is impossible to maintain, while assigning a clear and usual meaning to the words. For "mind" itself is only known to us as a series of fugitive impressions and memories, strung together by a consciousness of identity. This consciousness itself, moreover, is intermittent; but it rests—such is the irresistible suggestion—on a dimly recognized reality of substance below all consciousness, an abysmal whole of which each "I" is an infinitesimal part. Here occurs a fine passage about the unfathomable mystery of "self;" or (4) "matter" and "mind" are both phenomenal manifestations of one substance equally underlying both; and, as this is the only hypothesis which remains, Picton accepts it without direct discussion. The whole book is its indirect discussion; but we are tempted to remind ourselves right here that this theory is as little realizable in thought as number three, which was banished because unrealizable, and that its superiority lies in the fact that it is singly, instead of doubly, incomprehensible, if we may so speak. Accepting it, we profess ourselves "philosophers of ignorance," but not materialists and not positivists.

For, though the positivist looks on with a smile, let us see what we really have. This theory is not the mere negation of thought, after all. To know phenomena only is to know substance in part. Their ultimate, underlying substance, both "spirit" and "matter," so unknown as to its nature, is known, at least, to exist. It is known to be an infinite unity,—the totality of Being in which all things are one. It is known to be alive,—for though we may not attribute to it the "personal" mode of existence, such as we know in ourselves, yet it can but be thought of as the universal life, because the eternal energy of the universe must be spontaneous, and spontaneous energy is the fundamental element in our notion of all degrees of life.

Does such knowledge seem meagre? It, at least, greatly deepens our sense of awe. It gives us a triumphant confidence in the universe, because there is something eternal at the source of all. It gives dignity to the idea of man, because he shares in this eternal being and order. It vagues, solemnizes the moral demand,—the authority to which we bow being eternal. It makes all things reverend, for they are seen as fragments hinting and gleaming with the eternal unity.

Thus "the philosophy of ignorance" leaves man conscious of relation to the Infinite, and although such consciousness does not by itself constitute religion, it is essential to it.

For what is religion? The next two essays, on "the Antithesis of Faith and Sight" and "the Essential Nature of Religion," discuss this question.

Faith and sight, instead of being the exclusive contraries they are thought to be, essentially involve each other, and all phenomena of consciousness are due in part to each. "Sight" is the name given to positive knowledge, i.e., to belief founded on evidence of the senses,—one's own or another's; or on absolutely necessary inference from such evidence; or on such axioms as mathematical truths whose contrary is unthinkable. And he acutely shows that much theologic talk as, e.g., about "Christian evidences," confounds the terms and refers to faith what is really due to sight. "Faith" is the name given to certain instinctive beliefs that cannot be attested by sight. Picton does not care to call them "intuitions" or "innate ideas," or "blank mind-schedules," since special objection is made to all these terms; but he insists that they do result from "predispositions or susceptibilities inherent in human nature," whose origin we can only account for by a "preëstablished harmony existing between the germinating soul and the world." The material universe is the complement of the intellect, he says, borrowing Tyndall's phrase. These predispositions are only called into exercise by sense-impressions; yet they must preëxist in us to account for the bare possibility of those impressions becoming our perceptions and judgments. Our beliefs in the reality of the external world, in the uniformity of the course of Nature, in the persistence, under some form or other, of efficient causes, are examples of the "faiths" thus generated. These non-rational assumptions underlie all our reasoned ideas, and are as surely awakened (not given) by sense-impressions as the acorn, germinating under the sun and rain, brings forth the oak. We cannot have "faith" without "sight," but neither can we have "sight" without "faith."

"Religious" faith is merely the belief which comes from a special form of these inherent predispositions; viz., the predisposition to believe that "goodness is stronger than evil, and must prevail,"—a conviction which inevitably arises as soon as the distinction between good and evil begins to be perceived. The existence of Calvinists, ascetics, dyspeptics, devil-worshippers, does not show it to be evitable. There is "some preëstablished harmony between our moral nature and the grand order of the world about us. . . . The supreme moral order takes form in our conscience as love and righteousness." But this moral predisposition, more largely than those which originate the other faiths just cited, involves the element of will together with that of intellect. Religious faith is not the belief in "an eternal power which makes for righteousness," held as a theory only, but with practical life-assent. It is loyalty to the conviction. "The vital essence of (religious) faith lies in the energy of a voluntary devotion to the best ideal known." And this Picton thinks is what is deeply intended in the New Testament use of the word.

Now this faith joins with that sense of relation to ultimate substance and all-sufficient power which the philosophy of ignorance so fully brings to view; and, so joined, becomes religion. "Religion in its essential nature is an endeavor after a practical expression of man's conscious relation to the Infinite." Both "conscious relation" and "infinite" have, of course, a fluxional significance that includes every stage in man's development; and by "practical" is meant the inward energy of will as well as its outward loyalty in deed or worship.

Over and over he repeats that the reality of a divine impulse must be assumed throughout. Being the efficient cause of all evolution, it must be recognized as originating and maintaining this human "endeavor," to which all progress of the race is due. "That grand, measureless power, which is the inevitable, if nameless, complement of the conception of evolution, must be at the root of all religion, if its evolution be a normal phase in the development of mankind." And therefore in a very real sense, though a very different one from that usual in the churches, we can speak—we can but speak—of divine inspiration and revelation, and must claim that religion is not natural as opposed to revealed, but natural as revealed or inspired.

Picton makes good his definition, by showing how truly it describes religion in its whole historic development, from the lowest fetichism, through the Nature-worships and symbolic idolatries, up to the various "prophetic" faiths founded by Buddha, Mohammed, Moses, and Christ. But all the time it is that essence of religion, as utterly distinct from religious opinion, of which he speaks; and he evidently enjoys detailing the signs of present tendency to distinguish the two things,—such signs as the reduction in number of religious "fundamentals," the desuetude of creeds, the broadening terms of church-fellowships, the acceptance of science against Old Testament myths, and of historic criticism against New Testament stories. He rebukes the vague Broad Churchmen for the shuffling hesitation with which they cling to the dogmas of incarnation and divine personality as "essential;" these, too, are but opinions. Religion is consistent even with atheism, with every intellectual position save that of dogmatic "atomism."

The last essay, called "Christian Pantheism," describes further the outcome whither religious thought and feeling are tending: "To disguise the pantheism would be to fail in honesty. To give up the Christian name would not only be disloyalty to profound convictions, but it would be altogether inconsistent with any adequate description of the spiritual future which seems to be before us; for, notwithstanding the subversion of all ontological theories natural to the Christian era, the spirit of Christianity is immortal."

It is pantheism, because the deeper views of the universe are dissipating the common theistic notions of creation, Providence, personality, and design, and replacing them with ideas of the One-in-All in process of transcendent evolution. But to-day's pantheism does not, like Spinoza's, pretend to solve the Great Fact. It simply accepts it, ignoring the barren puzzle of beginning and ending, and recognizing in the Eternal Unity the living substance of all that has been, is, or can be. Each thing beautiful opens to it far horizons of beauty and goodness; it sees in every phenomenon an inexplicable mystery, and it refers all this beauty and mystery to the presence in it of that living Unity. Moreover, our pantheism does not ignore the facts of religious experience as part of the Great Fact. On the contrary, it finds, both in the lowest and the highest forms of such experience, testimonies in its behalf; and Paul, John, Jesus, the Orthodox church-fathers, the spiritual Catholics like the author of Theologica Germanica, are summoned to bear the witness of their very highest utterances to its truth.

And why is it Christian pantheism? Because pantheism does not prevent degrees of divineness in things, thoughts, lives,—and in Christ man's religious consciousness reached unique expression. It became in him a supreme oneness with God,—quite compatible, however, with intellectual limitations. And it was this "mind of Christ" that begot, after his crucifixion, that passionate reverence for him in which Christianity got its impulse; this mind of Christ, and not the beliefs in resurrection, or Messianism, or second advent, or miracles, or atonement, though all these beliefs were associated with the reverence.

His life—the manifestation of God-consciousness in his utter loyalty,—that, and no theological propositions taught by him, started Christianity on its course. Yet in those propositions we find further reason for retaining the name "Christian;" the New Testament theology all may be dropped, and the infallibility of any Scripture must be dropped, but still the substantial meanings of the great Christian dogmas remain. Grace, inspiration, divine communion, Christian revelation, Christ's special divinity (as just defined), the fatherhood of God,—the essences of these and of other materials of the creeds are facts, and abide. The personal conception of the Infinite, though far below the truth, is the truest that is possible for us. And even the notion of the Trinity, "as an expedient of thought" to well present the Divine Being to our minds, "is so valuable still that its abandonment is very much to be deprecated."

Finally, who can accept this faith? Shall we quote in answer his closing words to hint the music of his manner?—

"They are not many; but they are, in a very true sense, 'the powers of the world to come.' For that crowning race, which is our farthest vision in the files of coming generations, will not be men of science merely; still less will they be priests or puritans. They will love knowledge like the first; but they will have more true reverence than either of the latter. Meanwhile, the forerunners of that future race, notwithstanding all their determination to face the facts of their time, are often well-nigh appalled at the fundamental character of that revolution in opinion through which they are passing. And some of them begin to feel that nothing can ultimately satisfy them which reserves, under any form, the necessity for believing, as a matter of faith, in miraculous, spasmodic, partial, or non-natural modes of revelation. For such men as these, it is hoped that these pages have not been written in vain. The materialistic language of science need not trouble those who have gone through materialism, and come out at the other side. Philosophic despair need not paralyze those who feel that our very ignorance of God declares him. . . . An earnest endeavor after a practical expression of our conscious relation to the Infinite will, by divine grace, sustain a spiritual life incapable of bigotry or intellectual fear; and the contemplation of the universe, not as the mere handiwork only, but as the very vision of the Almighty, fills our souls with the presence of a self-evident, Eternal Power, who is as near to our hearts as he was to the soul of Elijah, and whose glory is more manifest to us than to those who trembled beneath the thunder-smitten Sinai."

Only one word of criticism shall be added to so long an abstract. It is not a great book. It is a broad rather than a deep statement. And yet I only mean by that that the queries sometimes stand on the page against his arguments, and ask for something farther than his analyses. He does not always clinch his nail, and he often hammers round his thought, blurring it by words too many. He is a poet trying to be a logician, and not always succeeding. He is a mystic before Nature, and a little still before tradition. But, more than most books are, it is a waymark, notable because it reveals the thoughts of many hearts to-day, and it will be helpful because the writer speaks out so manfully and yet with so much sympathy. To many of the hearts it would interpret the thoughts more clearly and systematically than they themselves have been able to think them out. Some of its hints, and even of its main ideas, THE INDEX readers have seen treated more clearly and at length in certain "Horticultural Hall Lectures,"—Samuel Johnson's "Interpretation of Nature," Mr. Abbot's "Study of Religion," and his late essay on "Darwin's Theory of Conscience and its Relation to Scientific Ethics," and Mr. Potter's lecture on "Religion and the Science of Religion." (March 9, 1872, March 8, 1873, March 12 and 26, 1874.) This is one of the pleasures of the book,—you meet a fellow-worshipper before the same grand thoughts that you are facing, a fellow-struggler with them. And none that I have met is more aglow with their inspiration than Picton. Of this glow of religious feeling and the real eloquence of utterance he often reaches, this bare schedule of his thought gives no idea.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE "STATE PERSONALITY" IDEA.

The last Christian Amendment convention met at Pittsburgh, Feb. 4. The addresses of its members indicate more clearly than ever the true design of the movement. It is not merely a theoretical acknowledgment in the Constitution of a personal Deity, but it is an open attempt to establish the civil law of the land upon the Mosaic code. Besides this, it incorporates the main ideas of the Orthodox system into the Constitution. Hon. Felix R. Brunot, in his opening address, states their intentions, of which the following extract is an expression:—

"We propose such an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (or its preamble) as will suitably acknowledge Almighty God as the author of the nation's existence and the ultimate source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct; and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land."

If this expression of a creed is not definite enough, take the following, from a sermon by Rev. Mr. Kennedy, published in the Christian Statesman of Feb. 15, 1873:—

"In pressing these Amendments, we ask the nation to accept a pretty extensive creed. When properly understood, they would express our belief in the Trinity, in the covenant of grace, in the mediation and atonement and mediatorial offices of Christ, in the Holy Spirit as the author of Revelation, and in the inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Word of God. Besides, in asking the nation to adopt them, we are asking it to renounce all heathenism, Judaism, popery, and infidelity. They are as distinctly Protestant as the National Covenant of Scotland."

Great as the crime against liberty of asserting in the Constitution the truth of church dogmas would be, still it may be said that the sentiments above quoted would be only passive and not active. But the phrase "to put all Christian institutions, etc., on a legal basis" implies a carrying out in action what is expressed in opinion—nay, what is asserted with all the confidence of popish decrees. In fact, a people who should express, in their basis of government, theories which they thought too chimerical to carry out would merely stultify themselves.

The terms in which the late convention express their idea that the State is a "moral person," taken in connection with their other addresses, show how absurd is the excuse that the Amendments are merely expressions of opinion. Rev. D. R. Kerr said:—

"But the nation is not a mere aggregation of individuals. It is an organic unity, with a moral accountability as close and as binding as any moral obligation resting on the individual man. And it was made so by an ordinance of God as clearly revealed as that which rules in the family or rules in the Church."

The State, then, is a "moral person." But a person is one who has relations to other persons. His existence is bound up with relations to other persons. The words justice, liberality, and the like, would be meaningless, if there were only one person. If the State is a moral person, it must be independent of all relations, and be only accountable to itself; or it must have a relation to a supernatural Person. That Person, it is said, is God, whose character is depicted in the Bible, which they assert is "the fountain of law and the supreme rule for the conduct of nations." The State at present does not acknowledge these things; therefore it must be a wicked person. This person is now required to change its mind. This change must be effected by legislation, or at most by a popular majority. But a majority implies a mass of individuals, a variety of ideas, a difference of will. It implies the question of individual liberty. How can the State as a person be reconciled with its component parts as individuals? Clearly, it can only be by utterly overriding and trampling down the opinions of a great part of the individuals of which a State is really composed.

If those who believe in the Christian Amendment get into power, they will be the State, the "moral person." If the State is a "moral person," its opinion of morality, expressed in law, will override the opinion of its component parts, just as in a man the strongest idea overpowers the weaker ones. That is just what the "State personality" idea would do; it would make the opinions and the liberty of large classes in our republic correspond to the overpowered ideas in the individual mind. If the State is a person, and believes it is subject to God and Jesus Christ, and also that the Bible is the only rule of its conduct, will it not incorporate the entire Mosaic code into the civil law as the sole rule of its conduct? When an individual believes these things and is consistent, does he not compel himself to abide by them? If he has rebellious inclinations, he overcomes them.

So will the religious liberty of the liberals be suppressed by the State as a "moral person." The State as a unity is the only free person; the right of the individual is ignored. If the State as a person believes the entire Mosaic code sacred, it is only a logical conclusion that it will legislate upon itself obedience to that code; and the State being assumed to be morally a unit, the existence of private opinion, and the right of private opinion and action, is rendered practically null and void. They will not decline to use power, since they say that the "nation was made accountable to God by an ordinance as clearly revealed as that which rules in the family or rules in the Church." We know how absolute the Christian theory makes family authority. As Mr. Brunot says: "We will place all Christian laws and usages on an undeniably legal basis."

The idea of a republic is an aggregate of individuals joined together to make laws for their mutual protection and welfare. The people make laws through their representatives; their government is an expression of the will of the people, and is not an entity, a person separate from the people, which can rightly assume to govern them by supernatural laws. But by the assumption that the State is a unit, it denies in one sense the personalities of its citizens.

If the State is a "moral person," and considers the denial of a personal God, the idea of the non-sacredness of the Sabbath, and profane swearing, to be immoral, it will legislate against them. In fact, these laws stand at present on the statute books of many of the States, owing to a clause in the Constitution giving certain powers to them. But they have been mostly a dead letter, owing to the republican idea that civil laws should only be made for the regulation of conduct between men. Some of the States have lately passed religious test laws for holding office. This is the first fruits of the Christian Amendment.

The idea that the State is a "moral person" is designed to establish, by a master-stroke, the right of the State to assert the divine origin of government, the divinity of Christ, the Bible as the inspired source of civil law. If it can be proved that the State is a unit in the sense which they mean, then it has the same right to assert its opinions that the private man has to believe and to regulate his conduct by Christian theology. If we assume unity and deny difference, then the rights of all liberals will be ignored. What does Mr. Kennedy mean, when he asks the nation to "renounce all heathenism, Judaism, popery, and infidelity"? If the State expresses its will in the civil law, the renouncing will be more than a mild request. If the State assumes these things, to be consistent it must act just as a private person would do. As an Orthodox person will scarcely ever read any evidence bearing against his belief, so the muzzling of the press by the State as a person is a perfectly legitimate conclusion.

But this theory and the correlative propositions establish more conclusively than ever that the present movement would be in effect a union of Church and State. The State cannot be a political person, and at the same time a theological person governing its conduct by the rules of the Church. The old dogma of the Romish Church that the State should be subservient to the Church, because the Church is a divine ordinance and alone teaches the decrees of God, is the very foundation of the new scheme. When the State assumes the truth of all the Orthodox opinions, and makes an assumed revelation the source of its authority, the political person is absorbed in the theological one; that is, Church and State become identified. Mere politics might send a minister to Europe, or legislate on the tariff. But the mere terms of the proposition that government is not of man, but of God, shows that the Church, under the form of the State, would be the real governing power.

In conclusion, we would say that we know no instance of more complete stultification than this attempt to incorporate the Orthodox theology into that Constitution which guarantees religious freedom to all, and then deny that it would be in any degree a union of Church and State.

THE OUTLOOK IN THE WEST.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

For a few weeks past I have been absent, making a flying trip in the West, and I have thought upon my return that perhaps a word touching the general outlook, as it appeared to me, might not be uninteresting to your readers.

My visit was mainly in Northern Illinois and Central Wisconsin; briefly also in Iowa. Everywhere I met with most cordial hospitality, and found ears open and ready, aye, anxious, to hear all that might be given in a line with the advanced religious thought of our time. There is certainly a great breaking-up of the old foundations; and a revolution, wider and deeper than any of us are aware of, is going forward, in large part silently, yet steadily and irresistibly, in all departments of our social life. It is inside as well as outside the churches, and the utterance of Protestantism, disavowal of the old dogmas, and affirmation of the broader, higher truths, is becoming every day more clear and bold, especially in the West. The arraignment and trial of Professor Swing, in Chicago, for heresy, is producing a profound impression in that city, and it is likely that the conservators of the Orthodox faith, the men who make it their especial business to hunt down and throttle dissent, every rising for spiritual liberty, will find abundant crops of heresy to be exterminated, ere they have done with it. Professor Swing is developing unexpected strength; friends rise to stand by his side in this matter, not only in the Presbyterian but in other denominations also. One of the most manly and intrepid utterances in regard to this persecution has lately come from Rev. Dr. Thomas, pastor of the First Methodist Church in Chicago.

The liberal societies in the West, say those bearing the name Unitarian, are, so far as my observation enables me to judge, more broad and free, and thoroughly committed to progress, than their fellow-societies in the East; and I was more than once assured, by those in position among them to know, that quite numerously, if not indeed generally, they stand virtually upon the same platform as that of Free Religion. Certainly I can bear witness, in those societies which it was my privilege to visit, to the utmost readiness to hear, and apparently to take home with a hearty welcome, the most radical utterances in religion, only let them be of an affirmative cast, and come from the soul of sincerity and love of truth.

In one city which I visited (Mt. Carroll, Illinois), the Presbyterian society, formerly large and flourishing, has gone down, utterly deceased, and its house of worship, a fine structure, has been closed for years. On the Sunday of my stay, it was kindly opened to me by the gentleman, Mr. H. A. Mills, my brother, who has it now in possession,—it having been sold under some lien upon it,—and a large and very attentive congregation gathered in it upon a single day's notice. This is one instance, and there are doubtless numerous others, where the field lies ready and open for the husbandman.

In Chicago I met on successive evenings, for conversation, circles made up of persons of high intelligence, thoughtful and deeply earnest, enjoying apparently nothing more than to gather night after night in parlors, to consider most patiently and carefully the noblest themes of thought and of life. The very generous hospitality I found in that city, the refreshing contact with living minds, the suggestion and quickening experienced there, will ever remain one of the bright and cherished spots in memory. Circles of like liberal and earnest spirit, I understand, are wont to meet in other cities of the West; but those I was unable this time to visit.

On the whole, I return with impressions altogether confirmed and strengthened of the openness and fruitfulness of the field. It waits the husbandman with seed, and harrow, and reaper; whence are the laborers to come? It is not the ordinary missionary work that is wanted; it is instruction, addressing the intelligence, quickening the thought, speaking to the reason, waking of the higher consciousness, and kindling to the loftier ambitions of the soul. It is the broad interpretation of religion, showing how poor and partial is the current doctrine and worship, how sacred is Nature, how high and hallowed is life. The people wait the vital word; they want not the dogma, nor any ism, nor the emphasis upon historic or personal; they hunger and thirst for the truths of life.

Is the Free Religious Association thoroughly awake to this want, doing its utmost best to meet and supply the pressing need?

CHARLES D. B. MILLS.

NOTICE.

The Third Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held in Toledo, Ohio, at No. 48 Summit Street, on Saturday, June 6, 1874, at 10 o'clock, A.M., in accordance with the articles of incorporation.

GLIMPSES.

"You are accustomed," said Prince Bismarck lately to the Ultramontane party (and his words apply more widely still), "to complain of oppression whenever not permitted to lord it over others." It is "persecution" to some people to be compelled to mind their own business.

At the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in New York last autumn, Rev. Josephus Angus, of Regent's Park, London, said: "With 50,000 preachers for ten years, and £150,000,000 sterling, the gospel might be carried to every man, woman, and child on the earth." Yes, but though a child can lead a horse to the water, all the world cannot make him drink. The gospel has greater difficulties to conquer than those of transportation.

We are glad to insert the following notice: "The annual meeting of the Massachusetts Society for Aiding Discharged Convicts will be held in the vestry of Park Street Church, Monday, May 25, at three o'clock P. M. Rev. Phillips Brooks, Rev. James B. Dunn, Rev. Willard F. Mallalieu, John M. Clark, Esq., Sheriff of Suffolk County, and Rev. John F. Moors, of Westfield, will address the meeting. The public are invited. Daniel Russell, General Agent."

"Peter's Pence" is the name given to the small voluntary contributions made by poor Catholics throughout the world toward the support of the Pope. "In ten years," says the Catholic Review, "the amount paid to the Papacy in Peter's Pence has reached the enormous sum of 271,175,000 francs. But since 1870 the increase has been much greater than previously, and the 271,175,000 in all probability now reach 400,000,000." The power of an organization which proves its hold on the hearts of its supporters by such a fact as this is not to be despised by any wise man.

"O God, why will my poor, short-lived, suffering, priest-ridden brother-man content himself with anything but facts?" This is the question of one writing to us from the far West: to which the answer would appear to be that man so often confounds facts and delusions as not to know them apart. Nothing makes some people so uneasy, and even irritable, as to pry into the grounds of any belief they may chance to hold. It verily seems as if they took it for a personal insult when you prick a bubble, explode a humbug, or root up a superstition. Yet for no service is a lover of realities more grateful; for the road to truth is macadamized with shattered falsehoods.

The terrible flood of Mill River, in Western Massachusetts, caused by the bursting of an immense reservoir, is one of the most frightful catastrophes that ever happened in New England. Probably two hundred lives have been lost, and two or three millions of property destroyed. The incidents of the disaster are most heart-rending to contemplate. All that human sympathy and generosity can do to alleviate the miseries of the sufferers will be done; but what can sympathy or generosity do in the face of woes so appalling in extent and intensity? The causes of this terrific calamity should be thoroughly investigated, no matter who is convicted of criminal neglect and carelessness of life, that such a deluge may never again inflict untold losses upon peaceful and unsuspecting communities.

I have received from St. Louis the March number of The Western; a review of education, science, literature, and art. The present number is quite as much occupied with the State as with the school, and this shows the broad and deep view which the circle of thoughtful men of St. Louis take of the subject of education. We are all accustomed to say that public education is the only safeguard of republican government; but I fear it is too often only a form of words, and that we do not recognize the constant influence which the school exerts in moulding the future State. The present financial troubles, which are the greatest present danger to the State, seem to arise from the neglect of the simplest principles of honesty and political economy, which ought to be as familiar to the mind of every citizen as his grammar and arithmetic. Mr. Harris prints in this number his admirable lecture on "Church and State" of which I have formerly spoken. If his elevated ideas could be more widely diffused, it would help to lift us out of the dead level of routine in education of which so much complaint is made. E. D. C.

Theodore Parker wrote thus of Thomas Paine in a letter to Miss C. Thayer: "I see some one has written a paper on Thomas Paine in the Atlantic Monthly, which excites the wrath of men who were not worthy to stoop down and untie the latchet of his shoes, nor to black his shoes, nor even to bring them home to him from the shoe-black. Yet Paine was no man for my fancying; in the latter part of his life he was filthy in his personal habits; there seems to me a tinge of lowness about him. But it must not be denied that he seems to have had less than the average amount of personal selfishness or vanity; his instincts were human and elevated, and his life devoted mainly to the great purposes of humanity. His political writings fell into my hands in my early boyhood, and I still think they were of immense service to the country. . . . I think he did more to promote piety and morality among men than a hundred ministers of that age in America. He did it by showing that religion is not responsible for the absurd doctrines taught in its name. For this reason, honest but bigoted ministers opposed him. They had a right to, but they misrepresented his doctrines." It is needless to say that the stories of Mr. Paine's "personal habits" are of very questionable authority.

About a year ago the London Times translated the leading article from a newspaper of Madrid which professes to be the organ of "the shirtless" or sans-culottes (los descamisados). It is a sad commentary on the desperation engendered by the long years of misrule and tyrannical superstition of which Catholic Spain has been the victim. This is the programme:—

"Anarchy is our only formula. Everything for everybody (todo para todos), from power even to woman. From this beauteous disorder, or rather orderly disorder, true harmony will spring. The earth and its products being the property of all, robbery, usury, and avarice will cease. With the destruction of the family tie and the establishment of free love, public and private prostitution will conclude, and the ideal of the Greek legislator be realized, in which the young shall respect and love their elders, seeing in each old man a father, and in each woman a mother or a sister. Getting rid of the bugbear called God (Dios), and reducing his mission to affright the children, there will terminate those industries called religions, which only serve to feed the mountebanks (farsántes), as Dupuy calls them, the curas (priests), whose mission is reduced to deceive and trick the foolish.

"This is our programme; but, before putting it into practice, it is necessary society should be purified. A blood-letting (sangria) is essential—short, but grand and extraordinary. The putrid branches of the social tree must be cut off that it may grow vigorous and healthy.

"These are our desires and aspirations; and, now that you know them, tremble, ye bourgeois, for your tyranny is coming to an end! Make way for the shirtless (descamisados)! Our black flag is unfurled. War to the family! War to property! War against God!"

DR. CULLIS AND HIS "HOME."

In THE INDEX of April 9 we made reference to Dr. Charles Cullis' Ninth Annual Report of the Consumptives' Home, and animadverted severely on certain statements which we quoted from it. If Dr. Cullis himself had not voluntarily brought his private affairs year after year before the public in his Reports, our animadversions would have been as uncalled-for as they are contrary to our practice of avoiding personalities; but what is published to the world is a fair subject of journalistic comment.

Two or three weeks after the appearance of our article, Mr. Benjamin F. Redfern, of the firm of Henry H. Tuttle & Co., Boston, called to see us at the office of THE INDEX, and very courteously complained of our strictures as unjust. We offered to print at once any reply he might bring or send; and, if we had been in error, an unequivocal confession of the fact should be made editorially also. After considerable delay, he brought us the article by Miss Dr. French which will be found among the "Communications" of this issue.

Mr. Redfern (who is very gentlemanly, and a warm personal friend of Dr. Cullis) states that the funds which defrayed the expenses of Dr. Cullis and family in their European trip were raised specially for that purpose; that no part of them was paid out of moneys contributed for the Home; and that he himself started and headed the subscription paper. As we had drawn a contrary inference from the Report itself (which is certainly expressed ambiguously on this point), and had said that out of the sum contributed for the Home, "apparently, were paid the expenses of a three months' trip to Europe for himself [Dr. Cullis], wife, and daughter," we now pronounce our inference wholly erroneous, and express our sincere regret that we did Dr. Cullis great injustice on this point, though unintentionally.

Further, we concede cheerfully (what we never denied or doubted) that the Consumptives' Home is doing a great deed of good in its own line, as a charitable institution. That its success and efficiency are due to "answers to prayer," is a different proposition; and this we disbelieve.

With reference to the estate of Mrs. Cullis, our statements are called in question, both by Miss French and by Mr. Potter's correspondent,—the latter thinking that the story of Mrs. Cullis being a "wealthy woman" is "incorrect." The cheque of $12,500, which we said was paid by our informant to Dr. Cullis "on his wife's account" was paid by another party, not to Dr. Cullis personally, but to the legal representative of the estate. On this point we misunderstood our informant, but the error is wholly unimportant, as the payment was referred to simply in corroboration of the statement that Mrs. Cullis had a handsome property in her own right. But in order to learn the exact truth on this subject, we have personally consulted the public records in the Probate Office of Suffolk County, and now give the following facts on testimony which cannot be disputed:—

The will of Franklin B. Reade, the former husband of Mrs. Cullis, who died June 26, 1857, was admitted to probate Nov. 8, 1858. The executors' inventory valued the property at $92,940.27; the trustees' inventory valued it at $89,959.73. On August 2, 1873, the trustees' inventory valued it at $103,373.12. The estate consists of personal property alone. By the terms of the will, the widow was to have "the usufruct of the net produce of the whole" of this property, until the only daughter of the testator should be of age or married; but if she married before the daughter became of age or married, the income was to be divided equally between the two. The daughter will not be of age until Oct. 23, 1875, and still resides with her mother. The two together enjoy the whole income of over $100,000, making their home with Dr. Cullis. Furthermore, Dr. Cullis, according to the positive and repeated statement of his friend Mr. Redfern, has a private medical practice of $12,000 a year, contributing to the Consumptives' Home the surplus of this income above his own expenses. The joint income of the family, therefore, if the wife and daughter receive seven per cent. on their property, is over $19,000 a year.

Now compare with these facts such extracts as the following from the Report:—

"Oct. 15. This morning I needed money to purchase provisions; I had only one dollar and seven cents in the world. I knew my God would supply all my need, and had no fear. In less than an hour the mail brought from Springfield two dollars; anonymously, three; a friend, five; and with what came in from my own practice, we had enough for the day's need." [p. 7.]

"I gave up my Life Insurance, feeling it not of faith to trust my family to an amount of money which they might receive from a Life Insurance Company, instead of trusting them in the hands of not only a living God, but a loving Father." [p. 9.]

Why speak of trusting his family to the money from a Life Insurance Company, rather than to the $103,373.12 which they had in their own right?

"Jan. 27. This morning I had spent my last dollar." [p. 27.]

"March 24. This morning not money enough to buy food for the day." [p. 34.]

"April 9. Two dollars for Cancer Home; four for my own use;" etc. [p. 34.]

What inference would any uninformed person necessarily draw from such repeated statements as we have quoted? That Dr. Cullis and his family had together an income of $19,000 a year? Or that he was a poor man, dependent on the two, three, four, five, fifty, or five hundred dollars which the charitable might be moved to send? Let the reader reply as he may, or must: the making of such statements as the above, unaccompanied with the facts also given above, and leading to a continual stream of donations which would probably be greatly diminished, if these facts were universally known, is exactly what we understand by "getting money under false pretences;" and only heroic charitableness can otherwise designate it.

But our tale is not ended. At the special request of Mr. Redfern, we called in his company to see Dr. Cullis in person last Friday. He received us politely, and professed a desire to be interrogated. In the course of the conversation we called his attention to this passage in his Report: "All has been done without any appeal to man for aid, but by simple reliance upon God's word." [p. 4.] We then showed him a copy of THE INDEX of March 1, 1873, containing an article by Mr. Potter upon this very Consumptives' Home, and we pointed out in particular this passage:—

"It sends forth an annual Report which describes in detail its operations, and annually advertises its financial needs. It keeps itself before the public by numerous contribution-boxes set in public places on which its wants are inscribed. Yet the claim is still made that the institution receives its donations solely in answer to prayer. The last annual Report, after describing the philanthropic work, says: 'Our sole trust for the entire support of the work is not in man, but in the living God who has said, Ask, and ye shall receive. During the past year, the Lord has sent us in cash, $46,201.47. For the eight years that the work has been established, without any solicitation from man, but in answer to prayer, God has sent the amount of $188,230.25. Also, in answer to prayer, towards building a Cancer House, $961.07: making, in addition to gifts of a previous year, $1,611.' Here is a plain statement that the institution has been carried on for eight years, 'without any solicitation from man.' Yet not to speak of the tacit 'solicitation' which is made to every benevolent person by the annual Report, and by newspaper notices describing the institution, its contribution-boxes make a very open 'solicitation.' I have copied the following inscription from one in the post-office in New Bedford:—

"'The Consumptives' Home, Boston, has no fund for its support.

"'Please give one cent.

"'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.' (Prov. xix. 17.)

"I have seen similar boxes in banks and insurance offices; and the writer from whose article I have quoted says that these boxes are widely distributed, and bring in the course of the year a good deal of money."

We asked Dr. Cullis directly how he reconciled the statement that "all had been done without any appeal to man," with the direct appeal on the boxes described by Mr. Potter. He replied that he was not responsible for what his friends did; that he had repeatedly received money "from the boxes" in New Bedford, but did not know certainly who put them up; that he had only three boxes put up under his own direction, at the Home, the Tract Depository, and his own office (where one was conspicuously posted, and labelled "Voluntary Contributions"). We replied that it was no matter who made the appeals, if the appeals were made; that money did come in consequence of them; and that it was not true that "all had been done without any appeal to man." To this we could get no other response than that he (Dr. Cullis) was not responsible for what his friends did: not even an admission that the sweeping statement of the Report was verbally an over-statement. He would not admit that truth required even a modification of it, but refused to see the direct contradiction between the assertion that no appeal had been made to man and the fact that a direct appeal is made on these boxes every day. The reader may judge whether our confidence in Dr. Cullis was increased by such a palpable evasion.

Not for the world would we wilfully do Dr. Cullis, or any man, an injustice; but it would be sheer hypocrisy to pretend that we are satisfied with such a measure of candor and sincerity as is here evinced. He confessed (unasked) that his chief object in starting the Home was to prove that God does answer the prayers of faith; and the sincerity of this belief may be at once conceded. But when he tries to prove his belief by such means as the above, we cannot say we do not see what we do see. If he had simply admitted that his language expressed more than he intended, we should have been satisfied; but, in homely phrase, he dodged a plain issue. Others may be satisfied with all this: for one, we have a higher idea of what constitutes straightforward truth and unalloyed sincerity. No matter how much good the Consumptives' Home may do (and this is much), the pretence that it is supported "without any appeal to man for aid" is a pious fraud; and we cannot soften down that phrase to please anybody.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 28th and 29th of May. The meeting will open with a session for business and addresses on Thursday evening, the 28th, at 7 3-4 o'clock, in Horticultural Hall (lower). At this session the following Amendments to the Constitution are to be acted upon:—

1. In the statement of the objects of the Association in the First Article, to change the phraseology so as to read thus: "Its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history."

2. To change the number of Directors, now limited by the Second Article to "six," so that the number shall be "not less than six nor more than ten."

At this session brief addresses are also expected, on various local and special phases of the FREE religious movement, from Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Rowland Connor, Rabbi Sonneschein, R. H. Ranney, and others.

On Friday, the 29th, there will be sessions at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M., in the upper Horticultural Hall. The morning session will be opened by an address from the President, O. B. Frothingham, on "The Validity and Necessity of the Free Religious Platform." Speeches will follow from S. R. Calthr p, T. W. Higginson, and F. E. Abbot. The three latter speakers are to represent, respectively, the "Christian," the "Extra-Christian," and the "Anti-Christian" attitude of believers in religious freedom. At the opening of the afternoon session, Rev. Dr. Bartol will read an essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times;" addresses expected from Rabbi S. H. Sonneschein, Bishop Ferrette, and C. G. Ames. In the evening, at the new Parker Memorial Hall, a Social Donation Festival is to be held. Brief addresses, music, conversation and refreshments will be provided for, and donations are hoped for from the friends of the Association.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary.

A RELIGIOUS DELUSION.

A friend has called my attention to an editorial article in THE INDEX of April 9, headed "Is It a Pious Fraud?" and suggested by the Ninth Annual Report of the Consumptives' Home, of Boston. That institution, it is professed, is carried on, like the famous Orphan Asylum of George Müller in England, solely by relying on prayer for the requisite pecuniary contributions. My friend thinks that the editor, in the article referred to, not only calls in question this mode of conducting the institution, but makes an unwarrantable attack on the character of Dr. Cullis, its conductor. She says that "a writer under the head of 'Correspondence' in the April number of the Homœopathic Materia Medica, gives the reader who may know little, if anything, of Dr. Cullis and his work, a very different impression of the work and its founder;" also that the story of his wife being a wealthy woman is "incorrect," and that in Boston, where Dr. Cullis was born and has always lived, among many who have known him from his boyhood she has "never heard a word which expressed or implied a doubt of his strict integrity."

I have no acquaintance with Dr. Cullis, except through the printed Reports of his institution; but I know that THE INDEX wants to do justice, and is ready, whenever it publicly arraigns character, to grant a hearing for the defence; and therefore I send this testimony in his favor from one in whom I have full confidence.

I must say, however, that the reading of Dr. Cullis's Report leaves with me the impression of a man entirely sincere and honest, but under a religious delusion, and also that the greater part of those who give their money to sustain the Home are under the same delusion; that there is, therefore, no getting of money "under false pretences," nor putting it to other uses than those for which it was given. The delusion is, both on the part of those who receive and those who give, that the money is obtained solely through prayer to God: though all who give might not perhaps make this claim.

From this point of view the Report is, indeed, a great religious curiosity. Its substance is summed up in this wise: "Our sole trust for the support of the work is not in man, but in the living God, who has said,—'Ask, and ye shall receive.' During the past year the Lord has sent us in cash $27,568.96. For the nine years that the work has been established, without any solicitation from man, but in answer to prayer, God has sent the amount of $215,799.21. Also [the past year], in answer to prayer, towards building a Cancer House, $1,467.06." The idea that the work is conducted "without any solicitation from man," "without any appeal to man for aid," is reiterated again and again through the Report. The simplicity with which this claim is put forth and maintained, while the Report itself on every page is a "solicitation" and "appeal," is one of the psychological curiosities of the pamphlet. True, the benevolent are not addressed in the second person and asked in so many words, "Will you not aid us in the work?" but the appeal is none the less direct, and with a large class of minds even more forcible, for being sent nominally "through the Lord." If Dr. Cullis had never sent out an Annual Report, nor taken any other means of advertising his charitable institution, then the effectiveness of his prayer-method might have been better tested. But if he had prayed wholly in secret, and never told any human being that he was praying, and never published in book or newspaper what he was praying for, can any rational being believe that he would have received the $215,000, and more, which have now been sent to him? The published letters enclosing remittances continually begin in this way: "I have been reading your last Report;" "Father read us your Report today;" "Your last Report very much interested me,"—showing that it is the Reports, circulating far and wide, that give information about the institution, and appeal directly to individual hearts to supply its needs. And when such items as the following are recorded and sent out to the world, there is no occasion to add a direct request to give, to make them an "appeal" and "solicitation" to sympathetic and charitable souls:—

"February 18.—Every bed for women filled at the Home.

"February 25.—Yesterday we were obliged to refuse a poor woman and her child; every bed is filled. . . . I pray God to incline my heart whether to pray for the enlargement of the Home or not.

"February 27.—Another poor woman refused for want of room.

"March 1.—Two more patients turned away. Feeling confident that it is the Lord's will that we should enlarge, I am praying for the means to do so."

Three days after this last date a "dear friend" called to give $5,000 towards building a new wing. The simple-minded doctor evidently interpreted this as a direct answer to his prayer through some supernatural process,—though in his simplicity he records that the "dear friend" told him that he had heard from some one at his home in Providence that the institution was "full to overflowing." Towards the end of the Report he says that the new wing had been erected so far as the $5,000 would allow; and adds, "It will take $3,000 more to finish the work,—the dear Lord will send it in his own time. We shall then be enabled to accommodate about forty more patients." Is not that a pretty direct "appeal to man for aid"? Would it have been really much more direct, if the doctor had completed the thought which was apparently in his mind, "Will not some of our good friends supply the needed sum?" instead of bringing himself up suddenly with that dash, and putting the burden of sending the money upon the Lord? So with regard to the "Cancer House" which he wants to build. The doctor has been praying for means for it for two or three years; and for two or three years the Reports have been publishing this fact, and also the great need of such an institution. But because he does not use the pronoun of the second person he does not call this "solicitation from man."

I am sorry to say, however, that even the doctor's definition of "without appeal to man for aid" is not faithfully adhered to in all the machinery for collecting money for his work. As I said in THE INDEX a year ago, a part of the money comes through contribution-boxes, which are put in various public places in New England cities and towns, as at post-offices, banks, insurance offices, stores, etc. The boxes are inscribed with the name and object of the institution for which the contributions are needed, with the statement that it has no fund for its support, and with the request, "Please give one cent." Now, unless it shall be said that this "Please give one cent" is a petition to the Almighty, it is certainly an appeal to man,—though not a very large one. But it may be that Dr. Cullis is not aware of these labels, which possibly were prepared by some sub-agent. But it is clear that he ought to be informed of them, because they not only testify against the veracity of the profession that the institution is supported "without any solicitation from man," but they vitiate his experiment as a test of the power of prayer.

Other points in this curious Report suggest comment,—as, for instance, since it records wonderful cures performed through prayer by Dr. Cullis, and since he teaches that faith only was necessary for these cures, one can hardly help asking why he could not have restored his own system to health by this process, last summer, instead of being obliged to take the journey to Europe; but these remarks must suffice. And let me close by saying that the Report, if from a psychological point of view curious, is from a rational point of view cause for sadness. How vast the work to be done before reason and religion can be brought into harmony and coöperation! W. J. P.

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—Colonel Higginson's beautiful and tender words about "Law and Love," in The Index of the 16th April, set my mind moving in the current of the old controversy about fate and free-will; and I bethought me that I might say something on this subject which I have never yet, to the best of my recollection, met with elsewhere.

I take it for granted that everything follows law, in the strict scientific sense of the word; and that there is no such thing as "chance," or "accident," if those terms imply an event uncaused or independent of law. Pressing it to its furthest limits, I concede that even the final disposition of our wills is regulated in the same way, by inexorable, undeviating law. I am a necessitarian of the truest stamp, and this philosophy forms no small part of the foundation of my faith and hope.

But I am also a firm believer in a limited freedom of will. The term "limited," as applied to "freedom," may seem a contradiction in terms; but it is not really so.

Just as a weather-cock is bound immovably to the church spire, and yet is free to revolve on its axis to suit the action of the wind,—so I conceive that my own will, although confined within limits which it cannot pass, is yet free to move as it is played upon by circumstances, motives, and desires. To-day two alternatives of conduct may lie before me, and, however my final choice may be directed, I have to perform the act of choosing for myself, and I do so choose; to-morrow I may see fit to change my mind, and, regretting my former choice, may deliberately reverse it and take the other alternative. This conscious yet limited freedom is not to be denied, nor explained away, because it seems prima-facie contrary to the doctrine of necessity. I believe it to be not merely reconcilable with it, but part and parcel of it; for man would not be man if he had not this limited freedom; it is the result of his nature and conditions to have it. Limited freedom is a link in the chain of necessity. Man is what he is, owing to the whole antecedents of his being, and therefore his very freedom was inevitable and is absolutely necessary, both as a sequence of the past and as a prelude to the future.

I do not pretend to write on this subject philosophically, but merely to put down the simple convictions which I have gained by thinking over the problem for myself.

I now wish to say something on the manifest purpose of our being thus at once the creatures of necessity, and yet sufficently free to become responsible.

1. The arrangement is indispensable to the formation of character. I utterly discard the idea of merit or demerit, as unworthy of man. "By the grace of God I am what I am"—is a good old phrase to express the entire absence of that self-righteousness which is unbecoming to any one who has thought at all on the problems of life. The doctrine of necessity is a grand leveller—the enemy of human pride. On the other hand, the less advanced of mankind are by this doctrine released from that senseless and cruel condemnation which labelled them "miserable sinners," "children of wrath," "sons of perdition," etc.

But while I discard merit and demerit, I think the more of the necessity for character, personal self-improvement; and this, it seems to me, is only to be provided for under the double scheme of necessity and free-will. Certainly if I have no freedom, I can have no possible virtue—nor vice. Virtue I take to be the deliberate selection of the better, when two courses are open. Without a choice, any course would be alike *un*virtuous. Machinery, useful or otherwise, would be all that man could ever develop into, unless he has a certain space in which the freedom of the will can have play,—unless alternatives of good and evil are present to his choice.

Thus the possibility of virtue is secured to us by our limited freedom, while the certainty of virtue is promised to us by the inexorable laws of man's being. On the one hand we see that we cannot escape becoming good; on the other we see that we can only become good from choice—by a "free-will offering of ourselves," as it were, to the author of the moral law.

We have a faculty which is, so to speak, an incarnation of this duality of necessity and freedom. It is love. Love is, in its purity and perfection, the most irrefragable of bonds, the most imperious and irresistible of impulses, one which "carries us away," as we so truthfully though unconsciously express it. Love is the incarnation of necessity, and supersedes by its impulsive force all deliberation, reasoning, calculation, and hurries us into some noble or beautiful action before we have time to think what we are doing or why we have done it. And yet, love is quite as much an incarnation of the principle of freedom. We never feel so free as when we are acting from love. Nay, freedom and the sense of freedom never rise so high in us as when we are impelled by love. We feel our liberty most when we are most its slaves.

And in this sublime fact of man's nature we behold the reconciliation of necessity and free-will; it is no longer a perplexing puzzle, a hopeless metaphysical contradiction, but an accomplished fact, a holy matrimony solemnized in heaven and upon earth. God has, as it were, decreed that man shall learn to do His blessed will; shall not only learn, but love, to do what is right; shall enter the paradise of Divine life itself in giving his whole heart to holy duty. But this cannot be unless man is free to choose between good and evil, and knows what he is doing. Experience must be his schoolmaster, and when the lessons of human life—here or hereafter—are learned, then God's decrees shall be fulfilled; and not only fulfilled, but attained in the very way and by the very means which He desired and decreed them to be attained—by those means, in fact, which alone could be available in the very necessity of the nature of things.

"Omnia vincit amor"—is not merely a poet's eulogy on the consummation of human felicity, but the hard prose of one of the most patent facts of the universe. And if God be love, and all His law is merged in love, then we cannot wonder that we are partakers of the Divine nature, and already feel and know by our own love not only what He is, but what is the law by which He rules.

Your readers will call me a mystic, I fear, for taking such a flight as this; but if the winds of Nature are against me, and my hold to earth too feeble, my kite will soon come down.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

Charles Voysey.

DR. CULLIS DEFENDED.

Editor Index:

Dear Sir,—The Index of April 9, in an article headed "Is It a Pious Fraud?" appears to sanction a statement of untruth and calumny against the integrity and earnestness of Dr. Cullis upon the authority of an unnamed accuser, who has called into question not only the resources from whence the "Faith Funds" are procured, but intimates that Dr. Cullis makes certain appropriation of funds donated "in answer to prayer" for his personal requirements. From the Ninth Annual Report of the Consumptives' Home is extracted, in a spirit unworthy of truth or justice, the following:—

"On May 13th, he (Dr. Cullis) records receiving 'upwards of two hundred dollars towards his travelling expenses.' On May 15th, 'over one thousand dollars have been sent to me up to this time, and our passages are engaged for the 20th.'"

At this juncture allow the writer (who is prepared to encounter any invidious and unauthorized attack upon one of the most blessed medical homes in the world) to substitute, in accordance with one of the aims of The Index, "knowledge for ignorance, and right for wrong"—to state that this amount was a gift to Dr. Cullis, individually, by some friends, and apart from the so-called "Faith Funds," which are sneered at by the author of the article as "donated by credulous persons."

Dr. Cullis should be no more culpable as lacking honesty or "receiving money under false pretences" than you or I would be, if we should accept and apply a gift from friends as they expressed a wish that it should be used. Let us have fair play.

To continue the selections:—

"To-day I received four thousand dollars; this is part of a legacy left by a lady of this city for the Home, the remainder of which I expect to receive before leaving. Thus our wonder-working God relieves me from all care, indicating His will. Only so very near the moment of departure has this help arrived"—when the insinuative bracket holds a spleenic query "[for the Home, or for Dr. Cullis?]"

This is devoid of reason, for it can well be understood by worldly-wise folk that the steward of such a large establishment would be compelled to make special arrangements for contingencies liable to follow absence from the scenes of action, when upwards of one hundred people depended upon "the answers to prayers," or to the personal supervision and fidelity of human power, for every need and provision incumbent upon invalidism! Dr. Cullis, consistent to his avowed trust, felt "that the Lord made a practical manifestation of His willingness" that Dr. Cullis "should accept the opportunity to recuperate his health offered by his friends," when the legacy for the exclusive use of the Home was so providentially paid in just before leaving for Europe.

In all cases, let the sum be large or small, strict account is rendered of all money received; and I know from absolute personal investigation that the funds are devoted with marvellous fidelity to the uses designated by the donators.

The Consumptives' Home is a regular incorporated institution, under homœopathic medical jurisprudence, with "Faith" as a watchword. You are perfectly right to intimate that "the public ought to know a little more about this wonderful and widely advertised 'Work of Faith;'" for as a blessed home for consumptives whose cases are incurable, and who are excluded from all other public institutions except the almshouse, here may they enter, irrespective of age, sex, color, or denominational distinctions—as long as a vacancy remains,—and be cared for and comforted, succored ofttimes from death, but always with patience, love and tenderness, which fills the hearts of all associates of this household of faith. And all look only to God through prayers for all the bounty they receive. They praise the Lord, not Dr. Cullis.

To conclude, without equivocation allow me to state, on verified testimony, that the payment of certain sums, as stated by your informant, to Dr. Cullis out of his wife's estate, is entirely unwarrantable. There never was even $1000 paid out of an income which, I am informed by the lady herself, is sufficient to care for herself, and allowing a small surplus which she devotes to a chosen office of the Lord; and that in no way is Dr. Cullis the recipient, or has he ever been benefitted in a pecuniary way by his marriage to a lady whose income, by such a step, was cut down one-half, and who has no controllable real estate, and never had the reputed wealth. Should she die, Dr. Cullis or any of the institution would not be benefited by this alliance, as the world counts treasure.

It is a cruel and malevolent attack from some unannounced quarter, which renders your informant better entitled to be scourged by the denunciation for false statements, than that Dr. Cullis "should merit attention from the police as the getter of money under false pretences."

Prepared to substantiate the foregoing, I remain a vindicator of truth, always ready to endorse as good a moral as Dr. Cullis' "Faith Work" presents to the searching eyes of earnest investigation.

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY ON THE "LABOR MOVEMENT."

"As you value peace, as you value the future of the American experiment in democratic institutions, I urge you to study and investigate the demands of labor."

The above is an extract from Mr. Hinckley's article on the "Labor Movement" in The Index of 23d April. What a pity that one wise enough to address these words to others, should not have, himself, fully done what he recommends others to do! In that event he would probably have discovered that most of his views and conclusions are in disagreement with the immutable laws of Nature, that so efficiently and so beneficially control labor and capital and their respective remuneration and occupation; and hence he would probably never have published ideas which are sure to mislead and injure labor, whose interests he no doubt has sincerely at heart.

The fundamental point is that all men are endowed with innumerable wants and desires which increase, pari passu, with the means of satisfying them. But all men are, also, endowed with faculties that enable them to satisfy these wants and desires in a greater or lesser degree. These wants and desires of man impel him to make the efforts necessary to their satisfaction; the greater the intensity of the wants and desires, the greater the efforts made to satisfy them, and productive effort must in all cases precede the enjoyment of consumption.

Now with these preliminary truths before us, it becomes self-evident that abstract justice and equity, as well as the real welfare and progress of humanity, require that each shall enjoy, not in proportion to his wants and desires, but in proportion to the amount and relative value of the useful things he produces or the useful services he renders.

Mr. Hinckley says: "The large majority of laboring men receive too little, and the few who constitute in the main the employing class receive too much." But this is a mere dogmatic assertion, which Mr. Hinckley makes no attempt to prove, and which no well established fact sustains. On the contrary, it can be clearly demonstrated that such a result can never occur except for a moment, perfect justice and equity in the division of the joint product of labor and capital between these two indispensable coöperative partners being maintained, everywhere, at all times, by the immutable laws of Nature, so long as labor and capital are left to transfer themselves from one occupation to another, and from one locality to another. Neither labor nor capital will long voluntarily remain at any occupation that yields less than the average remuneration obtainable at other occupations attended with similar advantages and disadvantages. Hence, no rise or fall in the remuneration of either labor or capital employed in any useful occupation can be permanent, unless an equal rise or fall soon follows in the remuneration obtainable at all other occupations necessary to the community. This renders it impossible for either labor or capital to obtain, for any length of time, at any occupation, more than its equitable share of the product of their conjoint efforts; for if one of these obtains more than this, it raises the remuneration of one partner above, and renders that of the other below, the average remuneration in other occupations. At once the laws of Nature, acting through the ever-active impulse of individual self-interest, will gradually restore the equilibrium in the remuneration obtainable at all occupations necessary to the welfare of humanity. The fact is that under the unimpeded sway of Nature's laws, wrong and injustice can only be momentary, because the evil consequences which wrong and injustice produce are so serious to both the perpetrators and those on whom they are perpetrated, that it soon leads to the eradication of wrong and injustice in some manner or other. The great natural system of the division of labor is based on equal remuneration for all the labor and capital employed at the various occupations necessary to the supply of human wants and desires, the only difference that can long exist being that necessary to compensate greater skill, aptitude, intelligence, danger, or uncertainties required for, or connected with, certain occupations, or to induce labor and capital to transfer themselves from useless or little needed occupations to others momentarily more useful or more desired by the community.

Fluctuations in the price of labor and of the products of labor do not depend on individual will or desire, but on supply and demand, and on cost of production. Were all occupations to yield, at all times, precisely the same remuneration—and were all things to be sold at cost, as some reformers propose,—how could labor and capital be induced to quit promptly occupations when over-done or no longer useful to the community, and transfer themselves to others more useful or more needed? Man's wants are not constant and unvarying—on the contrary, they undergo incessant changes; and, hence, under the natural system of the division of labor, every one must be induced to do, at all times, not what he himself desires or prefers, but what others most need or desire. When there are more shirts produced than the community need, women must be induced to do something else than make shirts; and so with everything else. Experience amply proves that no inducement is as powerful to insure prompt and constant changes from one occupation to another, as an increase or a diminution in the remuneration of labor and capital, which are thereby constantly induced to distribute themselves, at all times, among the various occupations necessary to humanity, in accordance with the relative, momentary importance of each to society. The moment the equilibrium between supply and demand is reëstablished, the remuneration obtainable at all occupations again becomes uniform, until some new variations between supply and demand arise; when again variations occur which induce new transfers of labor and capital from one occupation to another. This is the only mode yet discovered by which property distributes, at all times, labor and capital among the various occupations necessary to humanity. Governments, legislators, philanthropists, reformers, scientists, theorists, all have tried and signally failed in their various attempts to regulate the occupations and remuneration of labor and capital. Nothing but the unimpeded laws or forces of Nature have as yet successfully fulfilled this important and indispensable function.

Mr. Hinckley says: "Rational labor-reform means that the power of accumulated wealth shall be destroyed, and its natural counterpart, poverty, abolished; or in other words it calls for a more equitable distribution of wealth."

Now the whole power of accumulated wealth consists in its usefulness to humanity; and this power cannot be diminished so long as wealth is not only useful but indispensable to man, and its production requires labor and skill, and its accumulation and preservation need intelligence and self-abnegation. Nor would the distribution of wealth abolish poverty. Poverty is entirely due to non-production and to non-accumulation. There may be momentary individual enjoyment without accumulation, but no social progress is possible without it. The whole past progress of humanity has been due to those who have had the self-control and self-abnegation to forego their equitable, inherent right of consuming the products of their labor and skill for their own immediate enjoyment, and saved and accumulated them for the future service of themselves and others. Every advance in industry, art, science—all increase of knowledge and intelligence—is due to the compounding effects of the economized, accumulated results of past labor. How, then, can the accumulation of wealth be injurious to any one? It is the consumption of wealth that injures the community, not its accumulation.

And what more equitable and beneficial distribution of wealth can Mr. Hinckley or any one else suggest than to leave to each individual whatever he produces himself or obtains from others voluntarily, without constraint or compulsion? Mr. Hinckley himself admits that "you cannot teach the mass of men to hoard money. Here and there one individual may, but the majority will spend very nearly what they receive." This being true, why diminish or interfere with the rewards which justly accrue to those who exercise the self-sacrifice and self-control necessary to accumulate wealth, and who possess the intelligence necessary to make it productive, and thus advance the well-being and progress of humanity?

Nor have producers any just cause to complain that what they have produced has passed into the hands of the wealthy. They transferred the products of their labor for a valuable consideration, either as wages or as purchase money of these products. Hence these products are just as legitimately the property of those who thus obtained them from the producers, as the tools, the clothing, the furniture, and other things possessed by laborers, produced by others, and purchased with the wages earned by labor. How could the division of labor exist, if purchase did not create as full and legitimate a title to property as production? Who would pay wages to labor, if the results produced by labor did not accrue to those who employ and pay labor?

Mr. Hinckley holds that "by a law as strong as any in the universe the majority will receive, as a whole, about the amount they spend. That is, their wages and expenditures will be regulated by their habits of living." Mr. Hinckley here commits the common error of confounding cause and effect. Habits of living in no way regulate wages and possible expenditures. These depend entirely on the extent of the useful production of each, except in the case of property acquired by inheritance or gift. People do not earn or receive according to what they spend, but spend according to what they produce and receive, because production must invariably precede consumption and enjoyment. If the habits of living could regulate wages, every working man would soon adopt the habits of the millionaire, for most persons desire to live like millionaires. Unfortunately, or rather fortunately for those fond of self-indulgence, in regard to habits of living as in regard to everything else every one must cut his coat according to his cloth, as the coat cannot be made bigger than the cloth.

Another fundamental error Mr. Hinckley commits is in supposing that coöperation is a more equitable and more beneficial system for labor than the present one of wages; and that wages can be increased without correspondingly increasing the cost of the products of labor. The value of everything depends on the cost of the labor and capital required to produce it; and, capital being only the economized results of anterior labor, it follows that, in reality, the value of everything represents the past and present labor required to produce it, and nothing else. So long as monopolies are not created and maintained by human laws and human combinations, all the various contributions of Nature to human welfare remain gratuitous to man, no matter through how many hands they may pass. Man can only obtain remuneration for the labor expended in gathering and transporting the raw materials produced by Nature, and in fitting them to be useful to man. The vast, complicated, but most beneficial, system of the division of labor is nothing but the most perfect possible cooperative system, not limited to one occupation, locality, district, or State, but extending over the entire civilized globe; and so perfect and efficient is this system, that it uses the smallest possible number of managers, superintendents, and middle-men, every one being led by self-interest to direct himself to one of the occupations which are most wanted by the community, for which he is best fitted, and to labor as actively, as efficiently, and as intelligently as is in his power, because each is remunerated, in the end, in proportion to the extent, quality, and usefulness of what he produces. What are the results of all the cooperative movements ever organized by man, in comparison to those produced by this coöperative system of Nature, based on the division of labor and self-interest checked by unfettered competition?

But of all the errors enunciated by Mr. Hinckley, none are more radical than his supposition that, of all the various measures proposed on behalf of labor, the most efficacious will prove to be the ballot for woman, and a reduction in the hours of labor.

Woman is as much entitled to the ballot as man, but neither is entitled to use it as means of enforcing their views on others. Man has never been able to benefit himself by the ballot, the possession of which, in this country, has not prevented miserable demagogues and politicians from destroying every limitation formerly existing to the exercise of power by legislative bodies and government officials, so that to-day we are more heavily taxed, and more arbitrarily ruled, than any of the nations of Europe, the only effectual rights we have preserved being the right of free speech and the liberty of the press; but the latter has become of little value, as nearly every public journal in the country is subsidized and controlled by one or other of the political parties, or by some vested interest, adverse to the rights and well-being of the community. The powers delegated by the people, on the plea that they are to be used for their benefit, are only used to attack the rights of the people for the benefit of those who wield the government, local, State, and federal, and their tools and supporters. What, then, can be the value of the ballot to woman if obtained by her? If woman desires to have her just rights fully protected, she must join man in asking that individual rights be guaranteed by prohibiting majorities, however large, from oppressing and controlling, in any manner, the actions of a minority, however small, so long as the latter do not attack the inherent rights of their fellow-beings. It is the inherent right of every individual, man and woman, to differ from their fellow-beings in thought and actions, so long as he does not thereby interfere with the like liberty of others. The majority should ever remember that, by attacking the rights of a minority, they establish a precedent that authorizes the attack of their own rights when they become, as sooner or later they are sure to be, in the minority themselves. The rights of the majority are best protected by the protection of the rights of the minority. To this end, the majority should never be given the right to control and oppress the minority, through the ballot and legislation. As to the minority, neither with nor without the ballot can they control and oppress the majority. This fact completely refutes the theory that human governments are necessary to protect the people against the wrong actions of the criminal class which forms so trifling a minority in any community that they can easily be kept in order by the voluntary actions of each local community. It is by allowing, through the ballot and legislation, one or more local communities to control other communities, that all our political evils arise. Hence all legislation and government should be strictly local; the more restricted the area of their action the better. Centralized political power has ever been the great curse of humanity, and yet this is carried to-day to a greater extent than at any anterior period of time, except during the short rule of the great military conquerors of the past—the Alexanders, Cæsars, and Napoleons—who have arrested the onward progress of humanity.

It is the inherent right of every one to work as few or as many hours in the twenty-four as he or she chooses; no one has the right to dictate against their will the number of hours others shall work. But as no one can produce as much in eight hours as in ten hours or more, it must be evident to every one that man cannot be benefited by reducing the hours of labor. The amount produced by each will ever limit the amount that each can consume or enjoy for any length of time. To-day machinery is the great productive power, and will each day more and more supplant the labor of man, until he will have little else to do physically than to oversee and direct the machinery that in the future will produce in abundance, with little labor and effort on his part, every thing that he needs and desires. As the first cost of machinery is the same whether it runs twenty-four hours or six hours, while the production is four times as great in the one case as in the other, it follows that the true interest of all—of laborer as well as of capitalist—is that all machinery be run incessantly, by relays of laborers; thus immensely increasing production without corresponding increase in the capital employed. That is the only possible way of reducing the hours of labor without reducing the remuneration and enjoyment of the entire community. By increased production without increased outlay of capital alone can laborers obtain greater enjoyments. Decreased production injures every one, while increased production benefits every one, as a consumer. The enjoyments of all are dependent, not on the money remuneration obtained by each, but on the amount of the useful things needed or desired which this remuneration will command.

To solve correctly all problems in which money intervenes, it is necessary not only to ascertain what has to be given to obtain the money, but also what can be obtained in exchange for this money; because money is not the object of man's efforts, but merely the means of more readily obtaining what he seeks—the useful results of the labor and efforts of others in exchange for the results of his own efforts. Most people confound the means and the end; they imagine that money alone is necessary to man's welfare and progress, and hence they all seek to obtain a greater quantity of money for what they sell without regard to the effect this produces on the price of what they have to purchase themselves with the money received. They all forget that when any one sells anything at high money prices, some one else must buy at high money prices; they overlook the fact that the universal wish to sell dear and buy cheap is not only unjust but perfectly unattainable, thanks to the just and beneficent laws of Nature, which do not permit injustice long to exist in this world. Thanks to these perfect and immutable laws, nothing else is needed to check individual selfishness and cupidity than unfettered competition and enlightened self-interest. Under the sway of perfect individual liberty, experience will soon teach every one that the surest and easiest mode of obtaining, at all times, the services of others, is to render them the services they seek. In other words, as admirably expressed by Bastiat, the great French economist, society is based on the equitable system of "service for service," each individual being, at all times, sole judge of the value to himself of the services rendered and received. Let us, then, have faith in man, and Nature's immutable laws, and put a stop to all attempts to regulate the views and actions of man by short-sighted human laws, which are no sooner enacted than they need to be modified, because not in accordance with the circumstances and conditions they seek to control.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.
